At a general court martial, assembled at Meerut, on Monday, the 5th of August, 1839, Captain William Smith, of the 16th regiment native infantry, was arraigned on the following charges:—

1st.—"First, for inefficient conduct, and gross neglect of duty, when in command of a detachment, which marched from Meerut on the 24th May, 1839, for the purpose of securing treasure from Allypore to Delhi, in having proceeded by day, from Meerut to Allypore, it never having been present with the detachment between Allypore and Delhi, from the time of its marching from one place of encampment till it arrived at another; in having permitted the infantry portion of the detachment to be improperly dressed, when on duty and on the march, and the sentries to be without their muskets in the day time; and in not having personally delivered over the treasure to the civil authorities at Delhi."

2nd.—"For inebriate, disrespectful and litigious conduct, in the following instances:—"

1st.—"In having, in a letter to Lieutenant god Adjutant William Lawrence Macdonald, dated 1st May 1839, stated that four sergeants of the light company had represented to him, that they had been employed for the last two days at the Adjutant's quarters, in 'tailor's work,' which they have a decided dislike to perform; whereas the said sergeants had on this, and on former occasions, willingly assisted in making up uniforms, and the idea of its being unsuitable and tailor's work, was first suggested to them by Captain Smith, who, in a comparative riot, dated 2nd May 1839, recorded the following expressions: 'the said sergeants, who are of the said sergeants, Masterdew: 'the only good I know of him, is that I hear he is a capital hand at his needle.'"

2d.—"In having, in a letter addressed to Captain Charles Cheape, Brigade Major, dated 18th June last, appeared from the detention of Lieutenant Colonel George Williamson, to that of Major General John McCuskill, K. H., commanding the station of Meerut, on the case of Havildar Kernal (or Cawel) Sing, of the light company."

3d.—"In having disobeyed the following injunctions, contained in a letter from Lieutenant and Adjutant Macdonald, dated the 12th July 1839; 'and to avoid the serious trouble of such frequent and unnecessary letters, from you, the commanding officer directed, that you will not again address him in writing on the subject which he is preparing to submit to the Major General commanding the station; but that whatever you may have to communicate, or apply for, you will do so in person, in the manner directed in the last paragraph of my letter, No. 314, of the 18th ult.'; by sending a written reply, of the same date."

Findings.—"The court, on the evidence before them, are of opinion as follows:—"

1st.—That Captain William Smith, of the 16th regiment of native infantry, is guilty of the 1st charge.

2nd.—That on the 1st instance of the 2d charge, he is guilty, with the exception of having first suggested the idea that the work the four sergeants of the light company had been employed on, was unsuitable and tailor's work, of which the court acquit him.

3rd.—That Captain Smith is guilty of the 3d and 3d instances of the 2d charge.

The court are of opinion, with respect to the facts found in the 1st and 2d instances of the 3d charge, that Captain Smith is guilty of litigious conduct only, and acquit him of every other imputation.

The court are further of opinion, that in the 3d instance of the 2d charge, Captain Smith is guilty of inebriate, disrespectful and litigious conduct.

Sentence.—"The court sentence the prisoner, Captain William Smith, of the 16th regiment of native infantry, to be suspended from rank and pay only, for a period of six (6) calendar months."

Confirmed.

(Signed) JOHN RAMSAY, Major General.

THE MAILS OF THE BENGAL.—The patience of the long-suffering community of Calcutta, on which the Bombay Government has tried so many experiments, has fairly broken down under a new disappointment. After the intercourse with England by steam had been suspended, as usual, for three months, it was announced that, as the violence of the monsoon had subsided, the communication would be resumed, and that the first Steamer of the season would be dispatched from Bombay on the 12th September. The Post Master in Calcutta informed the public that the 27th of August would be the last safe day for the despatch of the Mails; and the "pent up" correspondence of three months, to the extent of between four and five thousand letters, was duly despatched by the appointed day. Last Saturday brought intelligence that the Berence had sailed without our Mails, which had been detained on the road by their extraordinary weight. The injury thus inflicted on the largest commercial body in India, is intolerable; and the feelings of the community have found vent in one universal burst of indignation. A meeting is to be forthwith convened, to give expression to the general sentiment. Never have we had a more just occasion for remonstrance. It is said that extraordinary efforts were made on the Bombay side to accelerate the arrival of the Mail; and we can easily believe such a report; but this only serves to prove more clearly the incurable defects of the present system of communication, and the indispensable necessity of adopting the comprehensive scheme to prevent a constant recurrence of these disappointments. Our remedy lies in an appeal to Parliament. The Court of Directors are utterly indifferent to the grievance under which we suffer. It does not affect them. The intelligence of the occupation of Cabul, and of the termination of the campaign, reached Bombay, through Lord Auckland's despatches, in time to be sent by the Berence. All the exclusive advantages which the Directors propose to themselves in the establishment of steamers, is secured. What matters it then if the general interests of the community in the metropolis of the empire are sacrificed? There is a cold selfishness in the policy of maintaining the present arrangements, which nothing but the interposition of Parliament, and the energy of the President of the Board of Control, can correct. Any further appeal to the Court of Directors for a system which should embrace the interests of all the Presidencies, would be only a waste of time and words. It would be vain to tell them that the present arrangements are unjust in the highest degree; that although the different Presidencies form but one empire, yet it is a fact that while Madras just covers the charges of its government, the revenues of Bombay invariably fall short of its expenditure; and the whole expense of this steam communication is borne by the Presidency, which has been so repeatedly deprived of the benefit of it. It would be vain to tell them that their boasted promise, put forth to still the complaints of Bengal, that the Mails should be conveyed from Bombay to Calcutta in ten days, has never been accomplished; that the Mails are eighteen, nineteen, twenty days in their transit; that with good steamers they might be conveyed from Suez to Calcutta in less time than is now passed in crossing the country. The answer of the Directors would be plain, cold and intelligible. The Mail is a Government Mail, and exists only for the benefit of London and India. We receive our dispatches in due time; to other interests beyond our own, we never lift our eyes. We must, therefore, go up to Parliament with an energetic remonstrance. We have a strong case. We can state that the loss and injury inflicted by the present imperfect arrangement on the Presidency which bears the whole expense, is now become regular and systematic; that we require steam communication for passengers, letters and packets, to be made equally the privilege of all India, and not of a section of the empire; that the same expense which must be incurred in keeping up a monthly communication between Bombay and Suez, would be sufficient, with a little addition, to keep up a communication which should embrace not only Bombay, but Bengal, Madras and Ceylon; and that the additional charge would be fully compensated by the increase of postage and passage money. We can assert that the Steamers cannot stem the monsoon from Bombay during three or four months in the year; that an experiment has been made of sending a sailing vessel with the Mails from Calcutta to Aden in the height of the monsoon; and that she performed the voyage in thirty-six days; while a vessel from Bombay sent about the same time to the same port, was forty-one days in making the voyage, though the distance is not more than a third; and that it is physically certain that Steamers would make their way with speed from Calcutta to the Red Sea at all seasons of the year. Our petition may succeed: it may fail; but in this case we shall have the satisfactory reflection of having done all in our power to obtain the comprehensive scheme.

The inconvenience which we suffer from the detention of papers in crossing the country may be a matter of amusement to our contemporaries at Bombay; but we can assure them that it is so great as to justify much more severe language than we choose to adopt. Our own newspapers, which were landed at Bombay on the 6th September, reached Calcutta on the 1st of October; that is to say in TWENTY-FIVE DAYS. The last intelligence from England states, that under the new arrangements, letters will be only THIRTY-FIVE DAYS in travelling from London to Bombay. Is it to be borne that after this they should be TWENTY-FIVE DAYS in reaching Calcutta?

POWER OF THE SUPREME GOVERNMENT TO VARY ACTS OF PARLIAMENT PASSED BEFORE THE CHARTER.—This subject has been brought under the consideration of the Indian community, by various Acts of the Legislative Council, and has been urged on public notice by those who consider the Council to have exceeded its powers on several occasions. It is a subject of large importance, and is worthy of more dispassionate examination than it has yet received. We shall, therefore, offer no apology for bringing it prominently before our readers, and stating the reasons which lead us to conclude, that the modifications which have been made of the statute law of England, by the Legislative Council, are not repugnant to the wishes of Parliament. The great question upon which the controversy turns, is simply this: When Parliament thought it advisable to establish, for the first time, a Local Legislature in India, with powers which had never been granted to the Governor General in Council before; was it, or was it not the intention of that body to vest this Local Legislature with power to vary and alter Acts of Parliament, to suit the peculiar circumstances of the country?

We conceive that when Parliament on this occasion thought fit to place certain statutes and laws beyond the reach of the newly-created Legislative Council, it was to be considered to have placed all others within its reach; and that the only object proposed by Parliament in adopting the use of the word "saving," was to allow the Local Legislature a power to modify all that was not included in the saving clause. The words of that clause are these:

"Save and except that the said Governor General in Council shall not have the power of making any laws or regulations which shall in any way repeal, vary, suspend or affect any of the provisions of this Act, or any of the provisions of the Acts for Punishing Mutiny and Disobedience of Officers, &c., or any provisions of any Act hereafter to be passed, in any wise affecting the said Company, or the said territories, or the inhabitants thereof, or any laws or regulations which shall in any way affect any Prerogative of the Crown, or the Authority of Parliament, or the Constitution or Rights of the said Company, or any part of the unwritten laws or constitution of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, wherein may depend in any degree the allegiance of any person to the Crown of the United Kingdom, or the Sovereignty or Dominion of the said Crown over any part of the said Territories."

It has been contended that the words, Authority of Parliament in this clause, must be taken to signify that it is not within the province of the Legislative Council to repeal, vary, suspend or affect any Act of Parliament whatever; but were this interpretation admitted, it would fix on Parliament the absurdity of a most glaring tautology. It would make the Legislature say—You, the Governor General, shall not vary this Act of ours; nor the Act for the Punishment of Mutiny; nor any Act which we may hereafter pass for the government of India; nor any Act of Parliament whatsoever: which would be a ridiculous enactment, unworthy of the wisdom of Parliament. The presumption arising from the fact, that some Acts passed before the Charter were specifically saved, is, therefore, that the Acts over which Parliament has not cast its broad shield, are consigned to the wisdom of the Local Legislature, to be varied, repealed or suspended, as may appear necessary.

It must also be remembered, that the Governor General in Council, before the passing of this Act, had no right whatever to vary, repeal or suspend an Act of Parliament; and that if it had been the intention of the Home Legislature to confer no new powers on the Indian Legislature in the New Charter, but to leave it in the same weak and humble position in which it stood before the passing of the Act, the most plain and common sense mode of procedure would have been to have preserved the same total silence regarding the authority of the Governor General in Council over Acts of Parliament, which was observed in preceding Charters; and the only motive which can be supposed to have led to the enumeration of certain Acts which were not to be touched, was, that Acts not enumerated were open to repeal and modification by the Local Legislature.

It is, moreover, difficult to account for the peculiar phraseology by which any Act hereafter passed is exempted from the controul of the Indian Legislature, except on the supposition that previous Acts were not intended to be placed in the same category. The words, Authority of Parliament, in their natural signification, are very different from Acts of Parliament which are to be known from their companions, according to the established rule of construction, as well in this instance, as in cases of ordinary life. We find in this Charter Act, that the subject of Acts of Parliament is first dealt with, and dismissed, and then the clause proceeds to the subjects of Prerogative, Authority of Parliament, Constitution of the Company, Allegiance and Sovereignty.

So much for the technical construction of words and sentences. But may it not be farther asked, could the Legislature be supposed to have acted with such inconsistency, as to have surrendered nearly the whole of the Common Law, by far the most extensive and most important of the laws of England, and to have tenaciously reserved every statutory provision since the time of legal memory? Of these statutes; of the completed and superannuated statutes of the Law of England, we have seen that Parliamentary Commissions have been employed, year after year, under Tory, as well as under Whig administrations, in brushing away, score upon score; and in making some small progress in the great design of reducing our laws to a consistency with the principles of common sense and equity. It is difficult to suppose, that Parliament should consider its authority impugned, if the Local Legislature performed a similar kind office for India, and undertook duties which the Home Legislature had not leisure to execute? Must our Criminal Code remain a Code of blood; our conveyances be tumbled more intricate and expensive than those of England, and our commerce be shackled by the restrictions of a barbarous age, until the English Legislature repels for India, what since the Charter it has repealed for England only? To us, indeed, it appears plain, that it was the distinct intention of Parliament,—which never willingly listens to Indian subjects,—to constitute a Local Legislature, and to invest it with authority to vary, modify, repeal or suspend those antecedent Acts of Parliament which were not specially exempted from its jurisdiction in the New Charter.

It seems difficult upon any other supposition to account for the concurrence of all the Home Authorities in the proceedings of the Legislative Council, by which Acts of Parliament have been repealed or modified. It seems still more difficult to account for the apathy of Parliament itself on this subject. In the case of the Act, facetiously called Black, a clause in an English statute was distinctly repealed. The community of Calcutta appealed to Parliament on that occasion, and sent home the first man of the Bar to sustain the appeal. The question was brought before Parliament; it was distinctly stated that the Indian Legislature had repealed a part of the statute law of England; but the case excited no indignation; it was virtually consigned to the tomb of the Capulets. If it had not been the intention of Parliament to confer on the Local Legislature the power which it had exercised: surely the occasion would not have been allowed to pass without an Act, declaratory of the original design of Parliament, and limiting the authority of the Legislative Council. Is it illogical, therefore, to infer, that the power which has been exercised in this country by the Governor General in Council, is considered to be in strict accordance with the intentions of the Home Legislature, and that it has received the distinct approbation of Parliament on the only occasion on which the subject was brought under the notice of the House?

MANUAL OF MEDICINE FOR THE NATIVES.—A Gentleman in the Upper Provinces, who takes a lively interest in Native education, suggests that a simple family medicine book in Oordoo would be a very popular and useful addition to the class books already in use. He would have it contain a couple of plates of the human skeleton and frame, a general description of the several parts of the body and their uses, the particular diseases to which they are commonly liable, with their symptoms, and the best simple bazar remedies and their way of being used. He would have a chapter also on general health, and the means of its preservation; and a table of diseases and prescriptions, including as many good Native recipes as possible—the whole being as written as to be intelligible to common respectable Natives, who would thus get some notion of their own structure, and what is necessary to keep it in repair. "In this district," says our Correspondent, "the best Hukoom (physician) is one of my Thannadars: people who cannot get to him, content themselves with taking whatever the ignorant people near them may recommend."

The suggestion is exceedingly good; and from what we hear, there seems to be a probability that the wish of our Correspondent will be gratified before long. A Manual is to be prepared, we believe, for the Native Medical School connected with the Medical College in Calcutta, and no time will be lost in putting it into the principal Native languages. When such a work is in contemplation, it would seem presumptuous for any other party to undertake one of similar character. At the same time we cannot but think, that much good might be done, by the extensive circulation of a much more simple tract than that suggested by our Correspondent. Dispensing with all anatomy and physiology, it should merely describe the most prevalent diseases of the country, as the most common forms of fever, diarrhoea, dysentery, spleen, and cholera, with the remedies most easily to be had. We have a most intense dislike of all books of "Domestic Medicine," and although we have the best of them, they stand upon our shelves unopened from year's end to year's end. But had we not medical advice at hand, the case would be different. We should then make friends with Thomas, Cooper and Graham very gladly. Now the poor people of India have no medical advice, but great plenty of sickness; and very many lives might be saved by a few easy instructions—certainly more than enough to compensate for the occasional mischief done by misapplying the prescriptions of the book. We wish, therefore, some benevolent physician of experience would condescend to become the poor man's doctor, and put as much as possible of the healing art into a tract of four and twenty pages.

PETITION FOR THE EQUALIZATION OF DUTIES.—We have placed among our selections, the Petition to the British Parliament, for an equalization of duties on Indian produce, brought forward by Mr. Martin, in the Court of Proprietors, and which the Directors propose to adopt with some modifications. We are happy to perceive that the Directors are anxious to repel the charge of indifference to the commercial welfare of India, which it appears Mr. Martin had endeavoured to fix on them. It is, however, a matter of historical record, that of all bodies, the Court of Directors have hitherto appeared to be the least anxious to remove existing impediments to the trade and agricultural prosperity of India. Almost every amelioration in the commercial relations of this country may be traced to the unaided importunity and zeal of other classes of society. The vast influence of the East India Corporation has never been adequately employed for the benefit of this distant empire. Down to the period of the last Charter, the idea still lingered in Leadenhall Street, that Europeans in India were no better than interlopers; and every measure brought by them under the notice of Parliament, however beneficial, was regarded with a jaundiced eye, and refused that co-operation which India had reason to expect from its constituted guardians. It is gratifying to observe that the Directors have turned over a new leaf; and have, with the relinquishment of their exclusive privileges, abjured those narrow jealousies which grew out of them; and that they are prepared to make common cause with India for Parliamentary relief from the burdens which still shackle its industry.

Much as has been done for India of late years, much remains to be done, before it can be said to enjoy the same common chance of improvement with other colonies and other nations. The manufactures of England are forced on it by low duties; its manufactures and agricultural industry are repressed by those heavy and unequal duties, which are laid on its productions on their importation into England. In this respect it has been treated with more severity and injustice than foreign nations in alliance with England. Had any foreign country agreed to receive English manufactures at the same favourable rate of duty at which they are imported into India, England would never have imposed such heavy duties on the reception of its produce. To India alone is denied all participation in the benefit of the reciprocity system. Not only, however, has India been regarded as a colony and not as a nation, but has been less favoured than the other colonies of Great Britain. This injustice requires to be redressed.

In many other respects has India been treated with a severity ill calculated to promote the growth of any attachment to the country which rules it. Millions are annually sent home, as one of the Directors very justly observed, for which there is at present no return; and for which no compensation can be made, except by the admission of our produce into England on the most favourable terms. This ought to be regarded rather as a question of justice, than one of fiscal regulation, considering that India sends in direct contribution to England two millions and a half sterling a year. Since the New Charter Act, India has been required to indemnify the Proprietors of India Stock for the loss of their China trade, by the payment, in annual instalments, of thirteen millions sterling. Of this arrangement, the whole benefit accrues to England, while the whole charge falls on India. Since the passing of the previous Charter in 1813, British manufactures have been introduced into this country to the extent, in one article alone, of nearly a million and a half sterling; and the Indian manufacturers have been driven out of the home and foreign markets. A change has thus been made unfavourable to the interests of the Indian manufacturers, to the extent of two millions and a half sterling a year. This is to be attributed, it is true, to the unrivalled skill and ingenuity of English manufacturers; and under the strict rules of political economy ought not, perhaps, to be ranked among injuries; yet it is impossible for those who reside in the country not to deplore the poverty and desolation which it has spread among a very numerous class of its industrious inhabitants. Manchester has impoverished and depopulated Dacca. We do not ask for prohibitory duties on English cottons; but India has, at least, a right to expect that its produce shall be received on the footing of the most favoured nations and colonies.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL SOCIETY OF BOMBAY: VOL. II.—We beg to return our thanks for the courtesy to which we are indebted, for the possession of this volume. The members of the medical profession in the Bombay Presidency appear to be duly sensible of their obligation, to contribute the results of their observation and practice to the world, and are fulfilling their duty in a manner highly creditable to themselves. It has always appeared to us that there was no profession besides, the members of which were so generally imbued with a generous spirit. The extent of their gratuitous attendance upon the poor, their frequent liberality in supplying both medicines and comforts to necessitous patients, and their ready sacrifice of rest and comfort at every call of suffering humanity, have endeared them to all ranks of modern society. But there is another sense in which the profession appears to be peculiarly generous in its character. There is a frankness of spirit in their professional writings exceedingly remarkable. They chronicle with equal minuteness their successful and their unsuccess-cessful practice; appearing justly to consider, that to prevent recurrence to worthless remedies, even by the exposure of their own failures, is scarcely less useful than to establish new and more effective means of cure. Were their papers to be read only by the profession, their disregard of personal considerations would be less remarkable; for in that case they would have reason to confide in the knowledge and experience of their readers, for a candid construction of their proceedings. But now-a-days what is written for the profession, goes abroad into the world, and finds readers of many sorts. The medical profession, therefore, in adopting the course they now universally pursue, seem to say, more emphatically than words could express it, that they disdain professional secrets and nostrums, and found their medical practice upon scientific fact, patiently ascertained by laborious and intelligent observation; and whilst they are honestly pursuing their researches, and following, as they best can, the high vocation of doing good, it matters little to them what judgement may be passed upon their conduct. The generous character of the medical profession is intellectual as well as moral. Their science is not a narrow professional thing. Anatomy and physiology are, indeed, its great foundations. But in order that they may be laid safely, and built upon with accuracy, the modern physician requires a universal education. Hence medical men, without number, are found to turn aside from their own peculiar walk, become the most successful cultivators of every department of natural science, and again bring back to their professional studies and labours the most important contributions. With the higher branches of pure mathematics, physicians have seldom interfered; but none have furnished us more richly with beautiful illustrations of natural mechanics, or made better use of mechanical resources. In the philosophy of mind, we are indebted to the medical profession for many of our best and soundest writers. Indeed, considering the intimate connection between mind and physical organization, both in the healthy and disordered state, there is no person has such opportunity of observing and appreciating mental phenomena as the physician. In zoology, botany, geology and mineralogy, and meteorology, nearly all our great names belong to the medical profession. In fact they are the most industrious and efficient labourers in the wide field of natural science, and are so by a sort of necessary extension of their mere professional studies. Even the new Sidices of Political Economy and Statistics (if they can be separated) can make no satisfactory progress without them.*

The liberal character of medical science is very apparent in the papers which compose the volume before us. Their great theme is, of course, the description and treatment of disease—but of disease under local peculiarities. Hence they are largely interspersed with information of general interest. The first paper in the volume is a Report by Assistant Surgeon F. Forbes, of the Disease at Palce; which the author considers identical with the plague of Egypt and the Levant, and with the Kuteh and Kattivar epidemics of 1817-20, and Marwar in 1836-7. He also concludes that it has at intervals prevailed epidemically throughout Marwar, from a very remote period, and is as likely to be indigenous there as in Egypt. We have been particularly interested by a Report on the Mubabulshwur, Convalescent Station for 1837-8, from J. Murray, Esq., the resident Surgeon. This Sanatorium stands on the Western Ghats, 4,500 feet above the level of the sea; and from 1st Oct. 1837 to 30th Sept. 1838, its mean temperature was 66. 20, the average minimum temperature 61. 37, the extreme minimum 48. 5; and the fall of rain for the year 180. 17 inches, which nearly all fell in November, June, July, August and September. The number of rainy days was 132. The present Report is the second that Mr. Murray has made, and is the more valuable, as containing the result of prolonged observation. It is at once favourable and discriminating. Whether a resort to the Sanatorium be of any value or not, it is evidently increasing greatly in popular estimation. The number of visitors is increasing every year: in 1836-37, they amounted to 232, and in 1837-38 to 313. But it is the object of the Report to establish the character of the Sanatorium upon a surer foundation than popular opinion. The author observes that the investigation of the influence of climate on disease, is one of peculiar difficulty, and beset with numerous sources of uncertainty and error, and our Indian hill-climates have one element of great importance to which he thinks too little attention has been paid: it is the stimulus created by diminished atmospheric pressure on the vascular system. It is the presence of this element, he thinks, in the constitution of inter-tropical mountain-climates, which emphatically distinguishes them from, and will ever render them inferior in therapeutic efficacy, to isothermal climates, whose temperature is the effect of latitude. The combination of this stimulus, with the tonic operation of reduced temperature, has unquestionably a beneficial effect, in various forms of non-organic disease; but at the same time, Mr. Murray is convinced, that it is this stimulus which render the Indian hill-climates inapplicable, if not positively injurious, in inflammatory or organic visceral diseases. His Report is chiefly a review of the principal cases of disease, that the visitors at the Sanatorium presented. They appear fairly to support his general views, and particularly establish the great value of the hill-climate, in invigorating constitutions that have been simply debilitated by the heat of the plains, in warding off many of the acute diseases incident to childhood, and supporting the energies of the constitution during the first years of children's growth, and so lessening their liability to future disease.

The volume before us contains several Hospital Reports of much value, and as many as forty-five cases illustrative of the pathology of the diseases of Bombay, by C. Morland, Esq., M. D.; but these are matters not exactly within our cognizance. We could notice with greater satisfaction the papers on the Topography of Ahmednagar, Mr. Gibson's Remarks on the vegetation, people and diseases of the Deccan, and the paper on the climate of Sattara; but this our limits prevent.

It is stated in the Appendix, that, at the request of Government, a Committee of the Medical and Physical Society of Bombay had presented a Report on the Medical Education of the Natives of the Bombay Presidency; but whether any practical good has resulted from it is unknown. The Committee collected much valuable information; but their Report has not been printed. The success of the Calcutta Medical College ought certainly to lead to the establishment of a similar institution at Bombay. The need is there as great as in Bengal; and it would be absurd to suppose that the inhabitants of Bombay could avail themselves of the Calcutta College. We hope yet to hear, that the Government of Bombay has been authorized to provide medical instruction for its people. Were the Medical Society to publish, at least a selection from the documents in their hands, we should think the object would be likely to receive more favourable attention.

EMPLOYMENT OF NATIVES IN THE REFORM OF THE MAGISTRACY.—Two Correspondents of the Commercial Advertiser have come forward to upbraid us with having advocated the employment of European, rather than Native agency, in the reformation of the Police. They both build their argument upon the assumption, that we are unfriendly to the employment of Natives in public situations of responsibility, than which nothing can be more unfounded. It does not follow, that because one branch of the public service appears to require qualifications, which are to be found in a higher degree among Europeans, than among Natives, any one who advises the preference of European functionaries in this particular department, is to be considered an enemy to the employment of Natives generally. It does not follow that because Sir John Keane sent European troops to storm the citadel of Ghizni, he is, therefore, anxious to dispossess him of the services of our brave Native army. There are situations in which the brighter peculiarities of the Native character may be employed to the great benefit of the public interests. There are others in which the objectionable propensities of the Natives, would be found an obstacle to the prosecution of public measures. In the former, we include the department of civil jurisprudence, in which Native shrewdness, penetration and industry, is most beneficially employed in promoting the ends of justice. In the latter case, we refer chiefly to the department of the Police, which holds out temptations, so difficult to be resisted, of putting in practice the ancient and inveterate habit of turning power into money. In the former case, whatever errors may be committed by the Native Judge, may be corrected by appeal to a higher Court. In the latter, the injury is irreparable. When the Native finds himself oppressed by an officer of the Police, he rarely complains, lest greater evils should befall him. His only remedy is carefully to conceal in future all cases of robbery and murder, of which the publication might bring down the Darogah upon the village with his endless train of extortions. The consequence is, that robbers are emboldened by the conviction that their victims are quite as anxious as themselves to conceal crimes; and the country is desolated. While, therefore, we advocate the employment of subordinate Native Police Officers on salaries which shall remove the necessity of extortion, we still cling to the notion, that the superintendence of the reform which is so much desired, should be committed, for the present, to Europeans; that is, we would place a European Magistrate in every case within reach of the complaints of the Natives; this, and this alone, can give them that confidence which will induce them to aid, instead of thwarting, the Police of the country.

Our Native friends must not forget that strict official integrity, in the sense in which the British Government understands the term, has never been deemed necessary in this country, under any former administration. It is, therefore, a virtue of modern introduction. Whether it existed under the Hindoo economy, we have not historical data sufficient to decide. Judging from the character of Hindoo legislation, we should think it did not. During the six centuries in which the Mahomedans held India, the universal law of the East, that of leaving every man in office to pay himself out of his situation, was in full operation. The same rule is in force to this day in Burmah, Siam, Cochin China and China. It is impossible that this long continued habit should not have begotten an idea, that the exactions of power are, in themselves, legitimate; and this idea, so pleasing in itself, is likely to be cherished and acted on, even after the necessity of illegal gain has been removed, by the gift of suitable salaries. That the British Government has not, as yet, established a scale of allowances sufficiently liberal to warrant its expecting that Native Officers will lay aside the habit of abusing their power, we fully admit; and we trust that every year will witness an improvement of liberality. But the habit has been so long domesticated, that many years of just and equitable administration must elapse, before it is eradicated; or before the bulk of the people can be brought to believe that their own best paid countrymen are impervious to a bribe. It is on this account chiefly that we are anxious to see the reform of the Police entrusted to European energy and integrity, in which the Natives have so much more confidence.

We are fully aware, that habits of official integrity are of recent growth in our native land. The Justices of the Peace in England, in the days of Queen Elizabeth, were as oppressive and venal as the Darogahs of Bengal; and they were paid with equal parsimony. But in the lapse of time, by the gradual ascendancy of the principles of justice; by the influence of a more elevating faith, the seat of power, supreme and subordinate, has been purified. We have little doubt that the same happy results will gradually follow the adoption of a wise, liberal, and vigilant system of Government in this country.

We entreat our Native friends not to imagine, that because we prefer European to Native agency, in the present emergency, when firmness and incorruptible integrity can alone save the country from the desolation of general pillage, that we shall cease to advocate the elevation of Natives to high situations in their own country. We believe there can be no error in government more fatal, than that of excluding Natives of the soil from all hope of distinction and wealth in the discharge of public duties. Every new office that is thrown open to the competition of Native talent, forms a new political tie, and becomes a new stimulus to national regeneration. Our advice in regard to the Natives of India would be, Educate them well; trust them well; pay them well; watch them well; and we shall, in the end, have no reason to complain of Native functionaries.

MALDA.—We are happy to hear of a revival of the spirit of benevolence at Malda. Perhaps no place in Bengal participated so early in the benefits bestowed by British piety. When Carey and Thomas, in the commencement of their Mission, in 1794, took charge of Indigo factories in the neighbouring district of Dinagore, they found a little group of Christian friends in Malda, (then, as a Commercial Residency, of much greater importance than it is now) amongst whom they conducted divine worship every alternate Sabbath. The Grants, Uday's, Creighton's and Ellertons of those days were men never to be forgotten in retracing the introduction of the gospel into this country. They not only strengthened the hands of the Missionaries, but partook of their labours in establishing schools, and communicating the word of God to the Natives. Their example found imitators in Malda for a long series of years; and now, we trust, it will be again revived. There is a wealthy Mahajan, it seems, in the town, who maintains an old man as a schoolmaster; and, through the zeal of the Magistrate, another teacher is to be added, and a supply of school books obtained, in the hope that the school may be enlarged and made fully effective. As soon as that object is gained, and the people appear to be sufficiently interested in the education of their children, it is intended that an English school shall be opened. As an accompaniment to this good work, the Acting Surgeon of the Station has determined to open an Hospital, for all who choose to have recourse to it. Both these undertakings will prove rather costly; but we trust they will obtain support from all the wealthy people in the district; and, though we have no authority for saying so, we imagine that any donations sent to the Magistrate for either object would be seasonable and acceptable. We shall be happy to hear of the successful progress made by our friends.

KURNOUL AND THE COMPANY'S GOVERNMENT.—Having received an accession of Native subscribers within the last month, we cannot, perhaps, testify our gratitude more effectually, than by endeavouring to disabuse them of the notion which some of their English friends would fain instil into their minds, regarding the Government and the institutions under which they live. One of their friends publicly declared some time back, that the British Government was infinitely worse than the despotism of the Mahomedans. We seize the opportunity afforded by the recent events at Kurmoul, to put this assertion to the test of facts. Kurmoul is an independent Mahomedan principality in the south of India, connected by ties and treaties with the paramount power of the empire. What were the causes which constrained the British Government to determine on dispatching a military force into this territory, we have yet to learn; we simply know that a respectable body of troops is about to march thither. The Nabob is the last remaining Pathan Prince in Southern India, described by those who know him, as prodigal, headstrong, ignorant and tyrannical; much given to cock-fighting and strong waters, and leaving public affairs to his Dewan, Nundar Khan. On the 15th of August, the whole of his horsemen, who were ten mounds in arrears, came forward, and the fort gates being shut, planted themselves on the outside of the gate, and declared they would not move till they got their money. The Rohillas next day followed their example, but no one dared to inform the Nabob of these movements. On the 17th, his Minister declared that the troops were very mutinous, on which the Nabob fell into a rage, and ordered their arrears to be discharged. On the 18th, he made the same report regarding the horsemen, and the Nabob ordered them to be beaten away. Their chief officer, on hearing this, said, Very good, but we will not stir till we have got our money. The Nabob was obliged to yield, and gave them an order on the Tooke's; that is, directed them to collect the rents from the land themselves. On the 21st, the town duties were less than 300 Rupees, which was the minimum fixed by the Nabob, and he ordered the Cutwal to receive personal chastisement, and the next day levied a contribution from all the petty dealers, according to their means.

Contrast the conduct of the British Government in abolishing the town duties, with that of the Mahomedan Prince, ordering the city officers to be whipped, because the duties fell short a single day, and levying fresh and arbitrary contributions on the inhabitants. Let the individual who so patriotically described the British Government, and any Natives who may have credited him, picture to themselves the scenes which would inevitably occur, if Calcutta, with its immense wealth, were placed for one twelvemonth under the uncontrolled dominion of a Mahomedan power. They would then find to their cost, that a Mahomedan Government is like rotten wood, on which, according to the Chinese aphorism, nothing good or useful can be carved. The British Government, under which Bengal has now flourished for more than eighty years, is, like all other governments, susceptible of improvement; and from the constant changes for the better which have been afloat during the last ten years, we should think that no men are more convinced of this fact, than the members of Government themselves. Our administration in this country is more equitable, more discriminative, and far more national, than it was fifty years ago. It is becoming daily more and more accommodated to the wants of the Natives; and except, perhaps, in the matter of resurrections, we think it may be affirmed, that there has not been a single measure of Government during the last quarter of a century, in the contemplation of which the Natives have not had reason to congratulate themselves that there was so little chance of the substitution of a Mahomedan for a British administration.

LOSS OF RECORDS.—Little has been heard of the losses sustained by the late gale. One of the most serious disasters, we believe, was the entire destruction of the fleet of the Commissioner of Police. Pinnaces, bulgerows, and country-boats, (with the exception of one small cook-boat quickly drawn up on shore,) were all dashed to pieces in little more than a quarter of an hour, at Baulrah. Happily the catastrophe occurred in the middle of the day, and no lives were lost. Much property, however, was destroyed, and all the office records, except a portion which one of the clerks had in use in his boat, and took care to bring on shore. What may be the value of such records, and whether they can be replaced from other sources, we cannot tell; but it does seem strange, that all the records of an office should be carried about the country, exposed to the well known risks of our river navigation, in the rainy season.

THE ALIF LAILA.—We have been favoured by Messrs. Thacker and Co., with a copy of the Second Volume of the "Alif Laila, or Arabian Night's Entertainment," printed in the original Arabic from the authentic copy of the work discovered by the late Major Macan, in Egypt. This spirited undertaking will, we trust, continue to experience the patronage of the public, in an unabated degree, that the publishers may be enabled to complete a work so precious to every lover of Oriental Literature.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 26.

The second instalment of the Overland Mail came in yesterday evening, and we now learn that the delay in its arrival at Bombay, arose from the detention, on the voyage, of the sailing vessel, the Oriente, by which it was sent on. The astounding intelligence is received by this opportunity, that the Captain Pasha, the Admiral of the Turkish fleet, by an act of unparalleled treachery, had delivered up the whole of the vessels under his charge, twenty-five in number, (two or three that sailed away excepted,) to Mahomed Ali; and that the Egyptian ruler had declared that he would never restore it, except the Sultan would renounce its terms, and grant him the hereditary independent sovereignty of Egypt, Syria and Arabia!! Seldom has such fortune attended the footsteps of one man. Between the 20th of June and 15th of July, Mahomed Ali has defeated, if not annihilated, the Turkish army, and obtained possession of the whole of the Turkish fleet. The Turkish empire is at his feet, and but for the interposition of the European powers, a new dynasty would ascend the throne of Constantinople.—The Helen, one of the best of the vessels employed in the China trade, is to take her departure with passengers for Aden, on the 15th of next month; the first of the vessels of the season; for we expect that an increasing number will be laid on the Red Sea line this year.—Mr. Macnaghten remains another twelvemonth at Calcut. Mrs. Macnaghten will proceed immediately to join him; and will be accompanied by nearly all the ladies of the officers belonging to the Regiments which remain there. Races are already announced. Who could have predicted two years ago, that in the summer of 1840, Calcut would be the scene of English games?—It is said that Mr. B. N. C. Hamilton will be selected as Governor of the North West Provinces. The appointment is, we believe, entirely in the gift of the Governor General, and may be legally bestowed on any Ensign or Assistant Surgeon who has served the Company faithfully five years; but it has hitherto been usual to make the selection from the members of Council, who have naturally a priority of claim.—Mr. Greenway throws no additional light on the thirteenth score of Rupees of treasure found at Bhurpore, which is to send so many Majors and Colonels home, and to give so unexpected an impulse to promotion. The intelligence came, it seems, from a Correspondent.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 27.

The Plantagenet is in from England, the 25th June, after an extraordinary passage of three months, and a day or two over. She brings a large accession of Missionary strength, Roman Catholic, Episcopal and Baptist.—Sir John Keane's Revolutions of the storm of Ghizel, have begun to be published in General Orders. Four days after the event, His Excellency remembers that he had forgotten how that Major Tronson commanded H. M. 18th on that occasion; and in a Supplementary Order, publicly acknowledges the Major's services at the head of his Regiment.—A very singular case has been decided in the Court of Requests, in which it is difficult to discover whether the wisdom of the Bench, or the honesty of Ditch Reporters, is most to be admired. It appears that Mr. F. Palmer was compelled, through misfortune, to take the benefit of the Insolvent Act. He requested Mr. B. F. Smith and Mr. Gogo, who are practitioners in the Petty Court, and also reporters, not to report his case, as it would do him a serious injury; and he offered to give them twenty Rupees as hush money. They agreed to his terms, and held their peace. Mr. Smith now sends Mr. Palmer for the amount, and it was decreed.—The Madras papers have it, that Mr. E. F. Elliott, the absent Chief Magistrate of Madras, is reported to have come on to Calcutta, to introduce the same reform into the Police of these provinces, which he has been so successful in introducing into Madras. Our contemporaries are out in their calculation; for if general and uncontradicted report be correct, Mr. Dampier succeeds to the charge of the Police, on the retirement of Mr. F. C. Smith.—The Madagascar Steamer, we learn, has not yet been disposed of at the Isle of France; but it seems more than probable that the Bengal Government will have her.—Letters have been received from the Mauritius. The political economists in that Island have taken the Bakers in hand; and it is proposed to place them under the surveillance of the Police. No one is to sell bread without special permission from the Chief Commissary; no permission is to be given, except to Bakers of acknowledged morality; and no bread is to be sold at a higher rate than that fixed by Proclamation. Why not adopt the more simple plan pursued at Constantinople; where, when the Bakers are refractory, the Sultan takes off the heads of two or three and sticks them on the gates of the palace; and the price of bread instantly falls?—This seems to be the year of short passages; the Jeune Louis is just in from the Cape in thirty nine days.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28.

The young Rajah, Kumbhar Khatonah Roy, who will come of age in three or four months, proceeded a day or two ago, apparently in consequence of some dispute with his mother, to the family mansion with Mr. Strettel, the Attorney, Mr. McCann, of the Police, and several others; and having first warned the females out of the room, proceeded to cord and seal up sundry chests which were then conveyed to the house of his guardian, Mr. J. C. C. Sutherland. The chests were said to contain thirty lakhs of Rupees. The case has been brought before the Police, where several barristers appeared for the parties. A great desire exists to bring the affair into the Supreme Court, where there has not been so far a case for many a long year.—The thirteen scores of Rupees said to have been discovered at Bhurpore is now said to have found its way to Joudhpore.—Further intelligence has been received from Egypt, as the instalments of the last Mail drop in. It is now affirmed that the Turkish fleet was not given up to Mahomed Ali by an act of treachery, but was sent to Alexandria, with the full consent of the new Sultan, there to be kept in safety from the grasp of Russia. The only fact we can, therefore, glean on this subject from the Mail, is, that the Turkish fleet is in the hands of Mahomed Ali, but under what arrangement we cannot tell.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 30.

The Rajah of Sattara has been dethroned by orders of Sir James Rivett Carnar, for plotting, as it is said, against the British Government; and his brother has been raised to the vacant seat. In this deposition, and that of Dost Mahomed, which was been already consummated, two other Rajas are, it is supposed, to come to reign before the close of this year, the Rajah of Joudhpore and the Nabob of Kurnool.—The Bombay Mail of the 14th of September has arrived; those of the 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th and 18th are still missing.—Intelligence has been received that the Itinerary left Bombay for England without the Calcutta Mails. The indignation which is felt by all classes of the community, is intense; but does not exceed the provocation. There is every reason to suppose that the packets which left Calcutta on the 20th and 21st will also be too late for the next Mail.—Letters from Nagpore state, that the letters of the Overland Mail which reached Bombay on the 6th, did not reach Nagpore till the morning of the 17th, eleven days between Bombay and the half way house at Nagpore, though the Directors promised India that the Mails should reach Calcutta in eight days.—The Berenice lost Bombay with 14,178 covers. Had the Calcutta Mail been received, the number of letters and papers would have been close upon twenty thousand. This is the largest number of covers ever despatched from India to England in a single month.—Mr. Tassin has just laid the community under a fresh obligation, by the publication of a map of the Tea country of Upper Assam. The map is on a large scale, and is executed with the utmost neatness.—The Bombay papers state, that the sum drawn from India by the Court of Directors, between the 1st of May, 1838, and the 30th April, 1839, amounted to 2,340,000*l*. The Delhi Gazette contains an account of a half effaced epitaph which has been discovered at Cabul, over the tomb of the Emperor, who was buried there in 1686.—Mr. Robertson, the Deputy Governor of Calcutta, left town on Saturday, on account of his health, to cruise for eight or ten days in H. M. Ship Comany.—Notwithstanding the gloomy accounts of the Opium market, the Lady Grant has left Bombay for Canton with 336 chests on board, belonging to Native speculators.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 1.

This is the auspicious day in which the New Post Office Regulations, one of the greatest boons ever conferred on India, comes into operation. Its importance may be judged of from the following notice of the reductions it will effect, which we have taken from the Englishman.

The funeral obsequies of the mother of Asaiah Doh, one of the most wealthy Natives in Calcutta, has just been celebrated with extraordinary pomp; but, happily, without the usual assemblage of paupers.—The Bombay Mail of the 14th has arrived, but those of the 9th and 10th, and intervening days, are yet absent.—The disappointment which has been experienced by the departure of the Berenice, without the Calcutta Mails, will, we learn, be shared by Government, which is only as it should be. All the despatches regarding the present state of affairs with the Burmese and Siam, which the young civilians in Calcutta were appointed to copy, that their contents might not get wind, were in the packets which arrived too late. For once the Directors will suffer from their own narrow policy.—The Church built for the Rev. Krishna Mohun Banerjee, in Cornwallis Square, was consecrated by the Bishop last week. It is called Christ Church. The Native preacher, for whom it is intended, preached his first sermon there on Sunday last, the 29th September.—The Harbans of this morning renews the report, that twelve new Regiments are to be raised immediately, six at the Bengal Presidency, four at Bombay, and two at Madras.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sum for the Friend of India:—

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

CONVERSION OR CHASTITY CHURCH.

The great little church, which has been built in Cornwallis Square, for the use of native converts to, and enquires after, Christianity, was consecrated yesterday morning by the Lord Bishop and his clergy, in presence of a crowded congregation of all classes of society, but principally of Hindus. Every seat was occupied, and numbers of people were standing in the aisles, as well as at the doors and windows.

The church is in the Gothic style, with painted windows, and has a row of clustered columns on each side. The east window is of neat stained glass, and the several doors are also similarly ornamented. The altar, pulpit, reading desk, and the accommodations for the congregation, are all of oak, plain, but very neat. About one-half of the church is partitioned off into pews, containing not chairs as is usual in this country, but long cane-bottomed seats. The remainder of the church is unenclosed, and furnished with seats similar to those in the pews.

The regular morning service was then read by the Rev. Kistomohun Bonnerjee. Interspersed with the usual prayers, were several, appropriate to the occasion, which were read by the Bishop himself.

After the service, an eloquent and impressive sermon was preached by the Venerable the Archbishop.—Bengal Herald, Sept. 29.

THE NEW CHURCH AT AGURPARAH.

The ceremony of laying the foundation stone for the above intended Building, was performed on Thursday evening after sunset by the Lord Bishop of Calcutta, who, in company with Mrs. Wilson and some other ladies, as well as his domestic Chaplain, and the Rev. Mr. Wybrow, repaired to the spot conducted by Mr. Vos, the Architect. The place appropriated for the edifice, is in the centre of the school compound, and on the bank of the river not far from the Parsonage. His Lordship commenced the ceremony with a Hymn sung up Bengalee by a group of the female wards of that Institution or Asylum, headed by the Rev. Mr. Wybrow and some assistant female teachers. The Rev. Mr. Frost, the Bishop's domestic Chaplain, then read one of the Psalms of David, suited to the occasion, and His Lordship prayed extempore in a solemn and becoming manner for a blessing on the undertaking—then addressed the assembly composed chiefly of natives, men and women, on the utility of having such a place, where a school and a parsonage were not wanting. The address was interpreted in Bengalee by the Rev. Mr. Wybrow. The Bishop then laid the foundation stone in a solemn manner, using the same form as that used in the act of baptising. The ceremony concluded with a doxology, "Praise God from whom all blessing's flow," &c.

It is a pity the Bishop and others were not there sooner, for it was after sun-set and dark when the ceremony was being performed.

There were those mentioned above present on the interesting occasion, and Messrs. Uday and Molloy, and a few others.

The cleanly, healthy, and apparently happy condition of the orphan girls (about 200 in number) who are refuted and educated at Mrs. Wilson's asylum, and the progress of those poor creatures, once labouring in mental darkness and destitute of the means of support, have made and are making, both in learning and refinement, tantum but lay claim to notice being taken of that truly charitable Lady's laudable exertions and acts, and these speak volumes in her favour. May the Heavenly Blessing ever rest on such Institutions, and endeavours so highly praiseworthy. How many an ignorant and benighted Hindoo female has been plucked up and brought to a home where knowledge is imparted and every comfort afforded!—Correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser, Sept. 29.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—From a perusal of your paper of the 29th ultimo, which was handed to me yesterday by a friend of mine, I find that your Correspondent, "D. C. under Regulation IX. of 1833," has, in reply to the query of "U. D. C.," stated that he has occasionally exercised the powers described in Clause 2, Section 24, Regulation VII. of 1825, and that his proceedings have always been approved of by the Commissioner of his Division. But the Unconcerned Deputy Collectors are not so generally allowed to exercise the above powers, as your Correspondent may be led to suppose. I can just inform him, that the Commissioner of the Division in which I have been posted, has lately issued a Circular to all the Collectors subordinate to him, to the following effect:—That a Deputy Collector under Regulation IX. of 1833, is not authorized to fine a person for disobedience to his order—and that if any person be found guilty of such offense, the case should be submitted to the Collector for his sentence. Your Correspondent is, perhaps, placed under a Commissioner who is favourably disposed towards the Revenue Officers, contemptuously called Regulation IX. Deputy Collectors.

I am, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

ANOTHEB D. C.

RELIGIOUS.

EMBARKATION OF AMERICAN MISSIONARIES.—We learn from the Salem Register, that Rev. Osro French and lady—Rev. David W. Hume and lady—Rev. Ebenezer Burgess and lady, and Miss Cynthia Farrar, were to embark from Salem on Monday, in the brig Waverly, Capt. Ward, for Bombay. They go out under the direction of the American Board, as a reinforcement to the Bombay Mission. At the Tabernacle, on Friday evening, instructions of the Prudential Committee were delivered to the missionaries, by the Rev. Dr. Anderson, one of the Secretaries of the Board, and they were affectionately addressed by the Rev. Mr. Worcester.—Christ. Watchman.

IDOLATRY OF THE MADRAS GOVERNMENT.—The following is a letter from the late R. Cathcart, Esq., of the Madras Civil Service, who was cut off by cholera in May, 1834. It appears in his Memoirs lately published. The system it exhibits is even worse than the endowment of temples, and is more widely diffused. "August 25, 1832.—Among the first official letters I received on coming to Salem, was one sanctioning fifty rupees to be expended, in each of the three Talooks or districts under me, for the invocation of rain. Rain is indeed, much required; the first crops have been almost lost in consequence of the deficiency. I called the Talook servants, to give a report of what was to be done. Some Brahmins were to engage in prayer to one of their gods for ten or twelve days, standing up to their necks in water, that their devotions might, I suppose, be instant. Others were to be employed to avert the anger of certain planets; and some to propitiate other gods. The whole to be fed at the expense of Government; to be superintended by government servants; and to be, in every respect, on the part of Government, seeking for the attainment of its revenue by these means. I could not order it. It does seem to me most gratuitous to engage in such an unviolation of the laws of God. While the money belonging to the Talook is regularly paid to them, and not appropriated to any other object, which would be esteemed robbery; while no obstruction is offered to the natives in worshipping what they choose—it seems almost without a cause when we thus uphold other gods. The Revenue Board sanctions disbursements to be made on this account in every collectorate when required. Well may we rather look for the withholding of the rain we seek. How long-suffering is God in ever again granting rain after such idolatry and worshipping of gods, to whom the subsequent goodness of the Lord will be attributed! I have written to the Collector privately, that I could not issue such orders. O Lord, forgive our national sins, and turn our hearts unto thee. The orders were subsequently issued in my three Talooks by the Collector, as well as in his own. There are fourteen Talooks in the district; each received fifty rupees for it; so that 700 rupees were thus expended in the dishonouring of God, and giving his glory to another. O Lord, forgive our iniquity!"

BOMBAY.—Native opinions in connection with the Parsee conversion.—In fulfillment of our promise of last month, we here submit a translation of the prospectus of a "Society for the protection of Hindoos." Very few remarks of ours need be made; the paper will suggest its own comment. It is evidently an elaborate document, and bears very decided testimony to the pains which Christianity has struck into the high places of Hindoos, as well as the fire temples of Zoroaster.

A SOCIETY OF HINDOOS FOR THE PRESERVATION OF THEIR OWN RELIGION.

The power of the Hindoos in this country having been destroyed, the Hindoo religion has gradually become depressed. And it is incumbent on every man, born in the Hindoo tribe, to strain every nerve for the preservation of his own religion, because one's own religion

Those who have little time can read what is written in the margin.

Through the reign of the Moonlunns, Portuguese, and English, the Hindoo religion has gone on suffering degradation. Therefore, as this religion is the cause is the sustainer of all welfare. And men are naturally so anxious to preserve their own religion, that for it, some are even sacrificed their lives; but this appeared during the time of the wicked and cruel Mussulmans and Portuguese, who were formerly; the present is no such time. Now the Padres are adopted measures to sink the Hindoo religion. To annihilate those (measures) abundance of wealth and labour must be expended, for if they are allowed to go on, the Hindoo religion is most surely in danger. Doubtless calamities happened to the Hindoo religion from the sword of the Mussulmans, but greater calamities than those will occur from the books and schools of the Padres.

This whole country is filled with Padres, their schools, and their books. In these schools, and books and in the speaking of these Padres, there is nothing great or useful; but only such matters as tend to draw the hearts of the people from Hindooism, and make them relish Christianity: and in those places where the Hindoo religion is not much attended to, hundreds of people have forsaken the Hindoo religion; and here, too, several persons, even of high caste, have become apostates.

The impressions received by the mind in childhood, are not easily erased. The thousands of children who are in the Padres' schools, where they do not hear a single word about the Hindoo religion, but the tenets of Christianity only, having received those tenets as their first impressions, will readily disregard Hindooism, and will grow up without restraint. Should the Padres see Sri Ganesha upon any of the writing boards, they call it the name of Ganesha, and rub it out with their shoes; should they see a book of shikhas or abhangas, burn it in the presence of the children. Thus those children see the Hindoo religion disgraced, and Christianity honoured. And these are the children, not of Brahmans and Kshatrias, but of poor people; consequently, the former have an opportunity of learning such things as the shikhas and paranas, and they do not see in their parents an excellent example of walking according to the Hindoo religion.

Such children cannot attend the Society's schools, because they are few and scant; and though they should be sent to these schools, it is not likely that their respect for Hindooism would cease to be displaced by it. In those subjects necessary to business only are taught, and not a single word respecting Hindooism; so that, in every way, the Hindoo religion is endangered. An exactly similar circumstance has befallen them at Calcutta, in Bengal; through which those of the Hindoos of that place who are wise, zealous for their own religion, and wealthy, have united and formed Societies for the preservation of their own religion, and have become diligent to render of non-effort the labours of the Padres: several new schools and books to confute the Christian tenets and commend Hindooism are in progress, and their excellent effects are being experienced.

Now the zeal, for the preservation of their own religion, of the intelligent and noble worthies of this place who are zealous for their own religion, nay, of the whole Hindoo community, they evince itself like that of a dutiful and affectionate son, zealous to support his parents. And these worthies expend thousands of rupees on the Society, as the gentlemen do on other institutions, and in several instances, many persons for the sake of respect acquire a very much wealth; most gladly therefore will they contribute a trifling portion of their wealth for the support of the Hindoo religion, by means of which all blessings are obtained. Knowing this, we entreat all persons that they would not send their children to the Padres' schools, but that they would according to their ability contribute something for the accomplishing of this object. The rules are—

1st. Schools are to be established, and books in support of the Hindoo religion to be printed for the use of the children, in proportion to the amount of all the well-being of the Hindoos, it is incumbent upon them to strain every nerve for its preservation.

The Padres have used most strenuous endeavours to sink the Hindoo religion, and many have begun to apostatise.

The children who attended the Padres' schools, see and hear nothing from the Padres, but contempt of Hindooism and commendation of Christianity. Consequently the Hindoos should not send their children to the Padres' schools, lest in the course of time they should apostatise.

They either tear it up or burn it in the presence of the children. Thus those children see the Hindoo religion disgraced, and Christianity honoured. And these are the children, not of Brahmans and Kshatrias, but of poor people; consequently, the former have an opportunity of learning such things as the shikhas and paranas, and they do not see in their parents an excellent example of walking according to the Hindoo religion.

Knowledge necessary for the transactions of business is obtained from the Society's schools, but it is not likely that their minds will cease to be drawn from Hindooism by this Society.

The great men among the Hindoos of Calcutta in Bengal, have adopted measures to destroy the labours of the Padres.

The great Hindoos of Bombay have zeal like that of a dutiful son for the preservation of their own religion, and they expend thousands of rupees on things of less import; it is not likely, therefore, that they will object to giving a trifle, for the support of their own religion.

Of the methods by which the labours of the Padres are to be destroyed.

2nd. Each school is to contain about a hundred children; it is to be good and public, and is to be committed to the charge of a wise and excellently qualified teacher. The teachers are to receive nothing from the children, but are to subsist on their salary.

3rd. The branches necessary for transacting business, such as reading, writing, arithmetic, and letter-writing; also good subjects from the Hindoo religion, such as, Bhakti Vigya, and other books of worship, victory, &c., or the new books that are to be printed in support of Hindooism, are to be taught.

4th. There will be a monthly, quarterly, half-yearly, and yearly examination of the schools, an account of which will be given to the great worthies by those who may be the superintendents of the schools; or if practicable, the great nobles may examine, and whatever methods may seem best to them are to be adopted. The system of teaching will be communicated to all. According to that, money will some way or other be expended on the instruction of the children, an account of which, accompanied with the signature of some respectable worthy, will be communicated to all.

5th. The progress of institutions. On the accomplishment this nature is a work of expense; for the want of the destruction this purpose let a subscription be raised of the Padres' labours, according to every one's ability from two annas to a thousand rupees. First of all, money must be collected to meet incipient expenditures; and in order that there may be no difficulty in making collections, and giving donations, a quarterly collection will be made, and the persons from whom a donation may be received shall have a receipt given to him, and his signature shall be taken in a book; and from him who may not be able to give in this manner, any thing may be received, at such time as may be most convenient for him to give; thus, money is to be collected quarterly and incidentally.

6th. The humble teachers are to receive a salary of from ten to twelve rupees; there are to be two teachers employed on this salary at present, and one superintendent on the same salary. And if a place cannot be procured gratis, a monthly allowance of three rupees is to be made. Out of this money being accumulated, new books are to be made according to the amount received; and after all these things are settled, the remainder is to be deposited at interest, in the hands of some respectable banker; and this work having succeeded by the truth of God, and a sufficient number of schools having been extended in the district of Bombay, they are to be established in other places also.

7th. The work of the superintendents. The way to discount it is to visit the schools once every two or three days; and so to conduct themselves towards the teachers, that their desire to instruct the children and do their work diligently, may be increased; to inform the great worthies how many children attend, what they learn, and how the teachers attend to their duties; to pay rent; collect all subscriptions; keep the accounts; and to attend to all matters which concern the money of the schools. These rules appear good at present; but if any one should see a better method of accomplishing the object, and would kindly communicate the same, it would be adopted.

Names of the superintendents and teachers, their caste, residence, age, attainments and their former occupation.—Oriental Christ. Spect.

LITTLE EDMUND.

By Mrs. Sigourney.

"Be good, little Edmund," your mother will say,
"She will whisper it soft in your ear,
And oftentimes repeat it, by night and by day,
That you need not forget it my dear.

And the ant at its work, and the flower-loving bee,
And the sweet little bird in the wood,
As it warbles a song from its nest on the tree,
Seems to say, "Little Eddy, be good."

"Be good," says the Bible—that volume of love—
And the wisest are bound to obey;
For the truths that it teaches will lead us above,
Where death shall the spirit away.

For as sure as the brook to the river doth run,
And the river to ocean's broad wave,
This rule, if we'll learn'd from your cradle, my son,
Will prove your best wealth at the grave.

EDUCATION.

EDUCATION IN PRUSSIA, RUSSIA, AND NORTH AMERICA.

—In connexion with this subject may be mentioned, as a sort of curiosity, a Report on Elementary Public Instruction in Europe, made to the State of Ohio, last year, by Prof. Stowe. This gentleman has just made the tour of Europe under a commission from the legislature above named. He says that, in some of the old countries, and where he was uniformly treated in the handsomest manner, much surprise was expressed at his coming abroad with such an errand on behalf of a State just as old as himself; and that only some thirty-six years. He seems to have been impressed deeply with a late "change in the policy of monarchical governments in respect to the education of the people. This he considers to indicate a new era in civilisation. He traces it from the American Revolution. But be that as it may, the old principle of the necessity of popular ignorance, he says, is abandoned. He mentions especially the Prussian, Russian, and Russian monarchs, representatives of the three great divisions of Christendom, as taking the lead in this work, and that so efficiently as to have devised better plans of instruction and more thoroughly applied them than the world has ever before witnessed." The object of the movement, he considers, in general terms, to be the prevention of an unbridled democracy, like that, for example, of Revolutionary France; to discipline and civilize the people; to give them, in the safest way, enough of the good of free institutions to satisfy the thirst of the age, without exciting it to demand the destruction of their old forms of government. This education, accordingly, has been accompanied, especially in Prussia and Bavaria, with great improvements in the condition and comforts of the people. At the same time, what was needlessly despotic has been mitigated. The Professor, after remarking that "Frederic William in his dress appearance, and whole deportment, is as unostentatious as an Ohio farmer," acknowledges that he was astonished at the "rigid simplicity of the great military despotism of central Europe," and contrasts it with what he calls the "pageantry, pomp, and ostentation of the limited monarchy of England." Such are the impressions of an intelligent American visiting Europe as a commissioner of education. You will know how to rate these at their real value without comment of mine.

In regard to what is doing in Russia, I am not aware that any so ample or fresh an account as the Professor's has appeared in England. The system, it seems, has gone so far, that the whole empire is divided into educational provinces, each having its own university—these into academic districts, having corresponding institutions—and these again into districts, each with its own elementary school; and, as regards the whole, there is a grand model-school, for teachers, at St. Petersburg. In 1855 six of the universities had come into operation. At the date of the last Report of the Minister of Public Instruction, there were 12,000 elementary schools, 480 private ones, and 57 gymnasia. This minister publishes a monthly educational journal, of great value, and circulates it throughout the empire. School directors and examiners are rigidly required to send their views for consideration. To secure good buildings, an architect has been appointed for each academic district. Liberal provision is made for the support of teachers. Young men, too, are sent abroad: in 1855 there were eighteen at Berlin and several in Vienna. Foreign teachers are welcomed with eagerness. This machinery extends far into Siberia, and beyond the Caucasus, to Irkutsk and the borders. There is a gymnasium at Tiflis, and fifteen schools in the neighbouring region. Numerous cases are given to show that the mobility and the wealthy take great interest in the system, many of them having contributed large sums to help on rising institutions. A merchant gave 10,000 roubles to found a school, besides offering his own house for the purpose, and free school for three years. This is pure zeal for the cause, since the government makes regular provision for the institutions above named. Much attention is given also to school libraries, &c. These facts are stated by the Professor with evident surprise, and he appeals to the citizens of Ohio, not to be outdone by the Russians.

From the Reports of the Superintendent of Common Schools in New York, just published, I am happy to be able to show that in that State, at least, the exertions of leading intelligent citizens, have not been in vain. On the 1st of July last, 98,800 schools were reported. The average term of instruction was eight months. The number of children in them was 329,113. The whole number of children between five and sixteen years of age, in the same district, exceeding this number only by 10,841. This may be considered as a fair indication of public sentiment regarding popular education in the Atlantic State: the new ones at the west show symptoms of the same feeling, but they cannot be expected to perfect their educational measures till the first rough work, which belongs to such communities, is completed. Internal improvements supersede everything else, and the spirit with which these are now carried on attests even us, who are used to such spectacles of energy. Michigan did not become a State till 1836, for want of sufficient population, and now they are engaged in the construction of lines of intercourse, chiefly railroads, to the extent of more than 1,100 miles, and have expended eight millions of dollars; to mention twenty-four private companies engaged in another thousand miles, at the expense of seven millions more!—American Correspondent of the Athenaeum.

SCIENTIFIC.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY, June 25.—Professor Owen read "Some Notes on the Birth of a Male Giraffe at the Zoological Gardens," which took place on the 19th. The period of gestation was taken, as nearly as possible, ascertained to be fourteen months and eighteen days, or fifteen lunar months. The young animal, when born, was perfectly motionless, and apparently dead, or strangled, its lips and nose being tinged with blood; but after gentle friction had been used for a short time, breathing and motion quickly followed. The mother was in no way depressed or debilitated. It came into the world like other mammals, with the eyes open, but the head was disproportionately large, and very soft and white at their expanded extremities; the skin was marked as distinctly as in the adult; the horns were represented by stiff and long black hairs, and the mane was well developed. It made many vigorous efforts to stand, raising itself on the four knees, and was able to support itself on outstretched legs two hours after birth; in ten hours it had gained sufficient strength to walk. It suckled with avidity warm cow's milk from a bottle, and once or twice uttered low, gentle groans or bleats, like a fawn or calf. The mother has not hitherto shown signs of affection or parental care, nor are there any symptoms of her nourishing her offspring; yet once having pushed down the young one when lustily moving away from it, she stood still, and gazed on the prostrate animal with an expression of maternal feeling. An anecdote is told by the keeper of the male giraffe, that whilst one looked on the mother and her young one with listless indifference, the other, the sire, showed great restlessness and impatience to approach them, and when allowed to do so, licked and caressed the young stranger. The length of the young Camelpopard, from the muzzle to the setting of the tail, is six feet ten inches; and when standing he can reach with his muzzle six feet. The Secretary stated, that though at first it had been deemed advisable not to expose it to the public, it now appeared so lively and healthy that visitors were freely admitted.—Athenaeum.

THE WHITE NILE.—Extract of a Letter from Mr. Thunbarn to Lord Prudhoe, dated Alexandria, May 25.—The fleet which the Pasha of Egypt had assembled at Khartoum, for the purpose of exploring the Bah-el-Abyad, or White Nile, has just returned from its experimental trip up that river, during which it was about thirty-five days, and reached the country where Shukia without encountering any opposition. It consists of six boats, having each 50 armed men; and, after having laid in a year's provisions, it will start again as soon as the waters begin to rise.—Athenaeum.

GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—Among the maps and donations on the table of the Geographical Society on the 24th June, was a map of Yucatan, in four sheets, on a scale of five miles to an inch, from a trigonometrical survey, by Padre Fr. Luis de la Cruz, of the Society of St. Francis, and by him presented to the Society; a map of northern Africa, by Segato, presented by Count Grimbey of Hlen-6, of Florence; a large map of the N. E. frontier of India, by Captain Bullock Pemberton; the original chart of the Gulf of Cambay, in India, by Lieut. Etheridge, of the Indian Navy, exhibiting the nature and form of the shoals which occasion the remarkable bore, or sudden rise of tide in that gulf, as well as its southern extension, to the dangerous Malacca banks, also surveyed by that officer during the past year.

The President announced, that in accordance with the recommendation of Major Jervis, now on the eve of his departure for India, as Surveyor General, the Council had that day resolved that a complete set of the London Geographical Journal should be presented to the public libraries of one of the chief naval and military stations in India, namely,—Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Bangalore, Hyderabad, Mow, Dacca, Calcutta, Meerut, and Delhi.—Athenaeum.

STATE AND PROSPECTS OF THE IRON TRADE.—We learn from a very elaborate paper read by Mr. J. Johnson, before the Liverpool Polytechnic Society, that there are at this time in Scotland fifty furnaces in blast, five out, seven building, and twenty-six contemplated. In South Wales, 122 furnaces in blast, seven out, thirty-one building, and ninety-one contemplated. In 1749 the annual produce of the kingdom was 17,350 tons of cast iron. Mr. Johnson thinks it probable, from the above data, that in 1854 Scotland alone will produce upwards of 360,000 tons, and that within five years 1,000,000 tons will be produced annually in South Wales.—Athenaeum.

AMERICAN GEOLOGY AND MINERAL WEALTH.—Among the sciences to which Europe may reasonably expect interesting additions from this country, even in its present unscientific era, is geology. The reason is obvious enough. It is eminently a practical science,—one from the pursuit of which immense economical benefits may be derived. Great attention has accordingly been paid to it recently, with the view, (and to some extent it has succeeded,) of ascertaining the mineral resources of the country, and the pecuniary interests of the country were involved in these investigations—compulsion was excited,—and the consequence followed that something like half the States of the Union, (and in some instances of the national government,) have adopted measures for complete geological surveys. This is a point of some importance, even to you English, and not merely in the theoretic cal sense of the word. Nobody has ever doubted, still less can any one doubt now, that the United States are most richly provided with a vast variety of minerals, of the greatest practical necessity and value, which it would be disgraceful to leave any longer wholly neglected, while we yearly spend enormous sums for inferior articles of the same kind, sent to us from foreign countries,—but that I am altogether right is called a Tariff-man. I do not believe in every country, at every stage of its progress, turning its hand to every species of business, and the fantastic pretence of being independent of the rest of mankind, any more than I believe in the policy of every individual doing the same thing. But there is a reasonable medium. For example, take the State of Maine, with a population of half a million and more—hardy, intelligent, industrious—a territory of 30,000 square miles, a great part of it good land for the farmer, but almost all of it unusually rich in mineral resources, yet still within three or four years, scarcely any attention has been paid to this subject. At Bangor, a city of 8,000 inhabitants, grown up almost within the last ten years, full of energy and spirit, almost all the houses are covered at this moment with Welsh slate (from your Bangor), which slate is first imported into New York, or Boston, and thence transported to Bangor. There it costs about 40 a ton; and so it is in every other State in the country; but I name this place as a special sample of genuine American "poor-spirit," and because, moreover, it now turns out, from the published reports of the State geologist, that at and about a place called Williamsburg, which is some thirty or forty miles distant, and on the banks of a navigable river, slate has been all this time reposing quietly, in quantities incalculable, "sufficient for the supply of the whole State," and that, if superior, to any ever used in roofing." This slate may already be lying at Bangor for 12 a ton, and for 24 in Boston. Now this, to use the geologist's words, is as bad as it was for our ancestors to send to Wales for grave-stones, or the New York Dutchmen to Holland for bricks. In another part of the State they had all the granite used in building, till very lately, from Old Massachusetts—a sort of second Old England; and this is now estimated that, in that very place, on the banks of a large river, there are more than a hundred millions of tons of granite, of a kind equal both in beauty and useful qualities, to any in the U. S. Maine is incredibly rich in this article. Mosquito Mountain, which rises 300 feet above high water, is all granite. Mount Waldo, which is twice as high, the same; and so on. Again, Maine is full of most excellent iron; and this is no slight thing. About 700,000 casks are exported yearly yet "on the Attock they pay dollars 16 a tierce for St. John's lime, while the very rocks under their feet are excellent limestone, and wood costs only the cutting." This is a fair specimen of the general neglect of our mineral resources. Further, in this same State, there is bone-slate, fit for slates for porcelain, Japan, lead, and vast quantities of valuable iron, "equal to the best from Sweden, and capable of being wrought into the finest kinds of cast-iron." These descriptions may be relied on as accurate. I select a few out of a great number, merely to illustrate the more general case. Corresponding movements are now everywhere bringing these hidden treasures to light. In Georgia, a branch of the Mint has been lately established, and, as a first experiment, dollars 140,000 worth of gold wrought from the immediate vicinity, within the year. In North Carolina, silver mines are beginning to be opened. A massive ingot, said to be the first ever made in this country, was the other day exhibited to the legislature of that State, by one of the owners. In the west, we are told that tin has just been discovered; but this remains to be proved. In Kentucky some air is commencing; the Governor remarked in his late annual "Message," and I believe, without exaggeration, that there are beds of good iron in that State equal to all the supplies of Great Britain and Ireland, with coal, as in Pennsylvania, in proportion. The latter state, as only the advantage of the former in the start and in her railroads and canals. These have been got up with a view to bring into the market her iron and coal, and they yielded, the last (most unfavourable) season, a revenue of a million of dollars.

These statements are not mere flourishes; far from it. The mineral resources of America are destined to maintain a keeping in the world's eye, with the most vast of her natural resources. One more mass: the Iron Mountains of Missouri, so called. For a time I thought the accounts of these formations much exaggerated, but numbers of calculating, scientific, and disinterested men have been of the ground, and they more than confirm the backward stories. Among them is Professor Shepherd, of South Carolina College, who thinks the quarries question raised all others both in quality and extent. The Knob Mountain is one entire mass of iron porphyry, of great purity; and the Iron Mountains is so entirely metallic that all the felspar (in which the neighbouring metal is deposited) he saw in surveying it, "would not exceed a pound in weight,"—the great mass being pure anhydrous peroxide. This hill is two miles round. Here are abundant supplies for the whole continent, surrounded, too, by all the minerals required for working it as well as the iron, in a region admirably situated for commerce. There are said to be ten million dollars' worth of iron now yearly consumed in the western valley alone, and a great part of this is imported at an enormous price.—Albany.

Meteorology.—Thus far looks. I must now tell you about Mr. Eddy, the rain-maker. You may remember that his theory of storms was referred to and explained by Prof. Hache, at the last meeting of the British Association (Athen. No. 365); and in the January Edinburgh Review it was said that if the "new theory" does not succeed in supplanting its rival, it cannot fail to lead the abettors of both to a more rigorous examination of their data. This is rather surprising, considering what Mr. Eddy claims. What this is, I wish to explain, and it can now be done satisfactorily, inasmuch as the theorist has been induced to come out with a full exposé. His object, then, is to manufacture rain, say in time of drought! Mr. Eddy begins by laying down these principles:—1. It is known, he says, that if air should be expanded into double the volume by diminished pressure, it would be cooled about ninety degrees of Fahrenheit. 2. I have shown, he says, by experiment, that if air at the common dew point in summer, in time of drought, 71 degrees, should go up in a column to a height sufficient to expand it by diminished pressure into double the volume, it would condense into water or visible cloud (by the cold of expansion) more than one-half of its vapour—a quantity sufficient to produce nearly three inches of rain. 3. It is known by chemical principles, that the calorific of elasticity given out during the condensation of this vapour, would be equal to about 30,000 tons of anthracite coal burnt on each square mile over which the cloud extended. 4. I have shown by experiment that this calorific of elasticity would prevent the air from cooling only about half as much as it would, if it had no vapour in it, or about forty-five degrees at the height assumed, which would cause the air in the cloud to be, at that height, about forty-five degrees warmer than the air on the outside of the cloud at the same height. I have shown from these principles [Journal of the Franklin Institute for 1836] that the barometer would fall, under the cloud thus formed, in favourable circumstances, as much as it is known to fall sometimes under the middle of a dense and lofty cloud; and that consequently the air would rush in on all sides towards the centre of the cloud and upwards in the middle, and thus continue the condensation of the vapour and the formation of cloud and the generation of rain. I have shown, also, that the air does move upwards on all sides towards the centre of the space or region where a great rain is falling, and of course upwards, after it comes in under the cloud, which is so much lighter than the surrounding air, at least, that it does so in all storms investigated, which now amount to sixteen, besides several tornadoes, in all of which the trees were blown with their tops upwards. From these principles, established by experiment, and confirmed by observation, it follows, that if a large body of air is made to ascend in a column, a large cloud will be generated, and that that cloud will contain in itself a self-sustaining power, which may move from the place over which it was formed, and cause the air over which it passes to rise up into it, and thus form more cloud and rain, until the rain may become general; for many storms which commence in the West Indies, very narrow, are known to move from the place of beginning several thousand miles, widening out and increasing in size, until they become many hundred miles wide.

Mr. Eddy now goes on to say, that if his reasoning be correct, thus far, great fires and the burning out of volcanoes should make rain; and he thinks there is proof that they do so. From some of these principles, too, it might be expected that clouds would form over large cities and towns, where much fuel is burnt; and Mr. Eddy says it is found to be so. He refers to Manchester for proof, and also to Mallett's statements, in his collection of facts concerning the Ashby coal-field. The connexion, then, he argues, between fires and rain, is not accidental. "Humboldt," he acknowledges this in the case of volcanoes, when he speaks of the mysterious connection between volcanoes and rain, and says that when a volcano bursts out in South America in a dry season it sometimes changes it to a rainy one." Mr. Eddy, of course, thinks that he has cleared up this "mystery," and that what applies to volcanoes applies to other fires in proportion. He explains why they do not always make rain, and states that he is willing to undertake experiments in proof of his argument, provided the Pennsylvania Legislature will reward him in the event of his being successful.—Albany.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PETITION OF THE HON. EAST INDIA COMPANY TO THE IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

"Sheweth,—1. That the subjects of the British Crown in Asia, under the government of the Hon. East India Company, amount to about 60,000,000 of industrious and intelligent people, who possess strong claims on the consideration of the Imperial Parliament.

"2. That British India is not a burden on the Annals of England, and, on the contrary, yields an annual revenue of nearly 20,000,000 sterling; by which an army of 30,000 Europeans and 175,000 native troops is maintained, and humane and civil improvements both at home and abroad are the result of its great extent of territory, vast population and immense resources, it materially contributes to the political power, maritime strength, and general prosperity of the British Empire.

3. That British India being possessed of a fertile soil, great variety of climate, and abundance of skilful labour, is capable of supplying Europe with almost every species of tropical produce of the best quality, at the cheapest rate; but that at present England enjoys a very small portion of the commercial advantages which British India offers to the merchants, manufacturers and artisans of the United Kingdom.

4. That for a quarter of a century British goods have been admitted, by a law of the Imperial Parliament, into all the ports of British India free of duty, as regards woollens, metals, wrought and unwrought, marine stores, &c., and at a duty not exceeding 2½ per cent. on cottons and all other goods; but the raw produce and manufactures prepared in India by our fellow-subjects during the same period have had onerous, and in some instances, prohibitory, duties imposed on them on their introduction into the parts of the United Kingdom, whilst the productions of foreign states in amity with us have been freely admitted under the reciprocity system.

5. That the consequence of such a course of proceeding has been the destruction, to an immense extent, to the manufactures of British India, whereby several hundred thousands of our fellow-subjects have been ruined; whilst the endeavours to introduce the raw products of the soil into the United Kingdom have not met with such encouragement as to alleviate the privation and distress produced by partial legislation, or to enable the people of India to become extensive purchasers of British manufactures.

6. That it is the opinion of your petitioners that the Imperial Parliament, by adopting a system of wise and generous policy towards India, might enable this country to become independent of all foreign nations for the regular supply of those staple articles on which her manufactures depend, and at the same time obtain a large and certain mart for her own commerce, whereby the people of England and of India would be united by the strong tie of mutual advantage, and our dominion in the East would rest on the broad and sure foundation of justice.

7. That your petitioners being intrusted with the responsible duty of governing British India, and being anxiously solicitous for the welfare and happiness of millions of their subjects committed to their care, earnestly desire the appointment of a select committee of your hon. house to investigate the commercial relations between England and India, with a view to the speedy and effectual adoption of such measures as may secure to our fellow-subjects in this remote and distant empire to which they are so fully entitled, but which in the opinion of your petitioners would equally promote the commercial, financial and political interests of both countries.

Sir C. Forbes seconded the motion, and having expressed his entire concurrence in the views taken by his honourable friend, Mr. Martin, suggested, that he should put his petition in the shape of resolutions, on which, when considered by the Court, a petition might hereafter be founded.

Mr. M. Martin, with the permission of the court, adopted this suggestion.

Mr. Majoribanks also concurred in having the matter in the shape of resolutions.

A proprietor (whose name we did not learn) contended that there was no ground for saying that the high duties on Indian produce and manufactures was the cause of the decrease of her exports to this country. In 1803, when there was a duty of 67 per cent. on them, her exports were about 14,000,000, but in 1836, when they were not more than 10 on some, and not exceeding 20 per cent. on others, the exports did not exceed 108,000. The decrease was not caused by the duty, but rather by the superiority of British machinery, which had so far outdone Indian competition.

If the whole of the Indian produce were removed, it would not avail against British competition. There was, therefore, he contended, no cause to go to Parliament within this respect. India had no reason to complain if she was treated like other colonies, and she was so in all respects as to produce, except in the duty on rum, which was 13s. the gallon. The great object of the friends of India should be to encourage by all means the culture of cotton, indigo, and those other products which she was so well fitted to raise.

Sir R. Campbell was in favour of an equalization of duty, for though the reduction would not enable India to compete with our machinery, that was no reason why an abuse should be continued. We had drawn millions from India, of which not a shilling went back, and it was impossible it could support such a drain, unless we did something to aid it. Even a small reduction would show the people of that country, we were disposed to do them justice. In addition to this, we should give every encouragement to the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing industry of India. This could not injure us, but on the contrary, would benefit us much.

Colonel Sykes was in favour of reciprocal duties. They would be a bond of union between India and Great Britain, as they would show that we were disposed to deal justly with India, and the stability of our Government there depended on the sense entertained of our justice.

Mr. Pearce suggested that the resolution should be submitted to the Court of Directors. He agreed that one great object should be to encourage the culture of the raw material (cotton), so as to compete successfully with the American market. He should like to see India relieved from unequal duties, and it was a satisfaction to know that even now her condition was improving, as was proved by her increased consumption of British produce.

Mr. Wrelding did not see any necessity for a reference to a committee of a House of Commons of a matter so obvious as the state of our commercial relations with India. Some of these ought to be altered, for it was due to India that we should treat her more as a nation and less as a colony.

The Chairman said that the Court of Directors had not been so backward in urging the commercial relations of India on the attention of Government, as some remarks of the hon. proprietor (Mr. Martin) would seem to imply. They had strongly urged the admission of the Mysore Coffee at a lower duty, so as to be on a footing with the same produce of our other possessions. As to the resolutions before the Court, he concurred in their general principles; but as there were some points in them on which there might be some points of difference, he had drawn up a resolution which he would propose in their stead, and which he hoped the Court would adopt. The resolution was, That, concurring generally in the principles of the resolutions proposed by Mr. Martin, the Court of Directors be requested to prepare and lay before the Court a petition of both Houses of Parliament, praying that the duties now levied on the productions and manufactures of India be placed on an equitable footing with reference to other parts of Her Majesty's dominions.

After a few observations from Mr. Wrelding (who alluded that the exports of India had increased from 300,000, in 1793 to 7,000,000, in 1836) and from Mr. Chapman (who contended that there should be a perfect equality of duties between the two countries), the resolution (of the Chairman) was put, and carried unanimously.

The Chairman then called the attention of the Court to the Bill (now pending in Parliament) concerning certain of the rules and orders of the Supreme Courts of Judicature in India.

Sir C. Forbes thought that such a Bill would annihilate the independence of those courts.

Mr. Serjeant Spankie said that the Bill referred only to regulations of pleadings in those courts, and was brought in by the Government in consequence of some doubts expressed by the officers of the Crown as to whether in some regulations already made in some of the Supreme Courts of Judicature they had not exceeded their authority.

Mr. Lewis saw no necessity for sending the rules first to the Governor-General in Council, and then to the Privy Council here. A more simple mode would be to make all the rules of pleading, in our Courts at Westminster, apply to the Courts in India.—The Bill was then approved of, and the Court adjourned.

AMATEUR SOCIETY, June 15.—Prof. Wilson in the chair.

His Highness Sultan Mahmood was elected an honorary member; and a donation from his Highness, consisting of fourteen volumes of Turkish works, printed at the Imperial Press at Constantinople, was laid upon the table. Thomas Newnham, Esq., presented several ancient gold Hindoo coins and medals, three Persian MSS., &c. And from G. W. Trall, Esq., the Society received an immense sheet of paper, measuring sixty feet by twenty-five, made at Kumaon, as a specimen of the native manufacturer's skill. This donation was accompanied by a memorandum written by Mr. Trall, descriptive of the processes of making the paper, and of the useful quality it possessed of being invulnerable to the attacks of insects. The Chevalier Etienne Fissani, and Count Alexander Fissani, of Constantinople, were elected non-resident members.

An Analysis, by Mr. W. Morley, of a portion of the 'Jamial Tuerkhi, of Reshideddin,' which has hitherto been supposed to be lost, was read to the meeting. The paper stated that the original work of Reshideddin comprehended four volumes; of these, the first comprised a history of the Turks and Mongols to the time of Oghuz; the second continued the same history to the time of the writer, with several other matters; the third volume contained a history of Mohammed, and the Arab tribes from whom he descended; and the fourth was chiefly geographical. Of all these, the first volume is the only one that has been hitherto known to exist; and a portion of that volume has been recently published by the French Government, with a translation by M. Quatremere. The remaining volumes are rarely mentioned even by Oriental writers; and are supposed to have been destroyed several centuries ago. The part of which an analysis was read to the meeting, is a portion of the second volume. The copy is of great antiquity, and was written in the lifetime of the author; in fact, within four years after he had completed his history. It is only a fragment, but it is well preserved, written in a beautiful hand, on large paper, and extends to fifty-nine folios, with numerous paintings, very well executed. The first part contains portions of the life of Mohammed, and is illustrated by three paintings. The second contains portions of a History of China, and is illustrated by numerous paintings of the kings recorded in the text; this portion is merely fragmental.

The names are Chinese, but the numbering of the dynasties, and the synchronisms with historical matter, better known to us, by no means accord with the accounts of the history of China, as we have it in modern writers. The third part contains the history of India; and, with the exception of one little hiatus, is complete. This is divided into two sections: the first begins with the chronology, geography, and natural history of India; and goes on to detail the history and genealogies of the kings of Delhi previous to the Mohammedan invasion—gives an account of Calcutta and its kings—and concludes with a history of the Brahman kings of the four yugas. The second section contains an account of the Hindu divinities, whom it names prophetically—it specifies Mahishur, Washur, and Brahmur, evidently Maheshwara, Vishnu, and Brahma,—and then proceeds to Shaktism, or Buddha, on whose birth, history, and qualifications it more especially dilates; in fact, nearly the whole of this section treats of the precepts and practice of Buddhism, or the religion founded by Shaktism. The fourth book is only a fragment; it contains the history of the Jews according to the Mohammedan tradition, and is illustrated by nine paintings. The reading of the fourth was not concluded, but we understand that it will appear in a forthcoming number of the Society's Journal. The meetings were adjourned till November.—Athenaeum.

DESCRIPTION OF THE CAVE-TEMPLE ON THE SALWEN ABOUT TWENTY MILES ABOVE NOUGHEM.—"The entrance is at the bottom of a perpendicular but uneven face of the mountain, inclosed in a strong brick wall, which forms a large vestibule. The entrance to this inclosure is by a path, winding along the foot of the mountain, and nothing remarkable strikes the eye till one passes the gate, where the attention is at once powerfully arrested. Not only is the space within the wall filled with images of Gandama of every size, but the whole face of the mountain, to the height of eighty or ninety feet, is covered with them. On every jutting crag stands some marble image, covered with gold, and spreading its uncouth proportions to the setting sun. Every recess is converted into a shrine for others. The smooth surfaces are covered by small flat images of burnt clay and set in stucco. Of these last there are literally thousands. In some places they have fallen off, with the plaster with which they were set, and left spots of naked rock, against which bees have built their hives undisturbed. Nowhere in the country have I seen such a display of wealth, ingenuity, and industry. But imposing as is this spectacle, it seems to me insignificant, compared to the scene which opens on entering the cavern itself. It is of vast size chiefly in one apartment, which needs no human art to render it sublime. The eye is confused, and the heart appalled, at the prodigious exhibition of infatuation and folly. Everywhere, on the floor, overhead, on the jutting points, and on the stasite festoons of the roof are crowded together images of Gandama—the offerings of successive ages. Some are perfectly gilded, others incrustated with calcareous matter; some fallen, yet sound; others mouldered; others just erected. Some of these are of stupendous size; some not larger than one's finger; and some of all the intermediate sizes; marble, stone, wood, brick, and clay. Some even of marble, are so time-worn, though sheltered of course from changes of temperature, that the face and fingers are obliterated. In some dark recesses, but were heard, and seemed numerous, but could not be seen. Here and there are models of temples, pyramids, [monasteries], &c., some not larger than a half bushel, and some ten or fifteen feet square, absolutely filled with small idols, heaped promiscuously one upon another. As we followed the paths which wound among the groups of figures and models, every new aspect of the cave presented new multitudes of images. A ship of five hundred tons could not carry away the half of them."—Macleod's Travels.

"THE ADVANTAGES THAT HAVE RESULTED TO THE PEOPLE OF TENASSERIM FROM THEIR HAVING BEEN PLACED UNDER BRITISH REVENUE AND BURMESA RULE."—"In the Tenasserim provinces, various improvements are perceptible. Coin is getting introduced instead of masses of lead and silver; manufactures are improving; implements of improved construction are used; justice is better administered; life is secure; property is sacred; religion is free; taxes, though heavy, are more equitable; imposed and courts of justice are pure, generally. Formerly, men were deterred from gathering round their comforts superior to their neighbours, or building better houses, for fear of exactions. Now, being secure in their earnings, the newly-built houses are much improved in size, materials, and workmanship. There are none of those traps and trammels which embarrass courts in England and America. The providing officer in each province, Amherst, Thway, and Mergul, the magistrate on certain days every week; and before him every citizen, male or female, without the intervention of lawyers, may plead his cause, and have immediate redress. Every where, in British Burma, the people praise English justice; but they are not yet reconciled to regular taxation. Though the Burman government, or its oppressive agents, took from them more than they pay now, yet it was occasional; consisted chiefly in labour, and they were not under the necessity of saving anything against a certain day, a matter to which they have been altogether unaccustomed."—Ibid.

POLITICAL CONDITION OF THE BURMESE.—"What a wretched government is this, which, while it taxes and burdens the people to the very utmost, grants them, in return, no security for person or property! Hence the huddling together in little wretched villages. A Burman with anything to lose would not dare to live on a farm even one mile from a village. No such case probably exists in the empire. The very poorest, and the Karcas, who are always very poor, venture to live in villages of three or four houses in the jungle, and cultivate patches of rice. The people at large live in the bondage of constant fear. Not only is thieving common, but robbing by bands. Thirty or fifty men, well armed and disguised, surround a house, while a detachment plunders it, and permit no one to go to their aid. On these rivers, robberies are even more frequent, as the chance of detection is less. We have scarcely a missionary family that has not been robbed."—Ibid.

INTERESTING CHARACTER IN SIAM.—"Chow Fah Noi is the probable successor to the throne; and in fact is now entitled to it, rather than the present monarch, who is an illegitimate son. Should he assume the government, Siam must advance from her present lowliness and semi-civilization. No man in the kingdom is so qualified to govern well. His naturally fine mind is enlarged and improved by intercourse with foreigners, by the perusal of English works, by studying Euclid and Newton, by freeing himself from a bigoted attachment to Buddhism, by easily recognizing our superiority, and a readiness to adopt our arts. He understands the use of the sextant and chronometer, and was anxious for the latest nautical almanac, which I promised to send him. His little daughters, accustomed to the sight of foreigners, so far from showing any signs of fear, always came to sit upon my lap, though the yellow cosmetics on their limbs was sure to be transferred in part to my dress. One of them took pride in requesting to me a few words of English, and the other took care to display her power of projecting the elbow forward. This singular custom, as has been mentioned, prevails in Burma, and is deemed very genteel."—Ibid.

GOVERNMENT NOTIFICATIONS.

ORDERS BY THE HONOURABLE THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR OF BENGAL.

STEAM MEETING.—In consequence of the disappointment inflicted on the community of Calcutta, by the untimely departure of the Berenice, without our Mails, a meeting was held in Calcutta, last Saturday evening, to petition Government on the present state of Steam Communication between Calcutta and London. The object of the meeting was, in some measure, anticipated, by an announcement, published the preceding day, by Mr. Robertson, our Deputy Governor, that orders would be issued to the Government of Bombay, not to allow the Steamers in future to leave the Port, till after the arrival of the packets despatched by all the Presidencies, on the last officially safe day. The Post Master in Calcutta will, we fancy, be constrained to allow a longer period in future for the transmission of the Mail, than has hitherto been the practice; and he will thus furnish a beautiful comment on that declaration of the Court of Directors, that the Mails should be conveyed across the country in ten days.

The meeting was addressed, with his usual spirit and humour, by Mr. Parker, a friend, or relative of whom,—he did not state the relationship,—farther than it may be indicated by identity in the initials, H. M. P. drew up the very able petition which was unanimously adopted. Mr. Turton shewed his friends in Calcutta, that his eloquence had lost none of its vigour by his journey across the Atlantic; and Capt. Taylor, who opened the meeting, pointed out, in forcible language, the necessity which had led to its being convened. It was diversified by a slight passage of arms between two barristers, Mr. Clarke and Mr. James Hume, the latter of whom delivered his maiden speech, which was very brilliant and promising, and was frequently interrupted with cheers.

The great interest of the meeting, however, consisted in the usurpation which Mr. Turton gave, that an effort would be immediately made to start a vessel of adequate power from this port, by means of public contributions. This is to begin at the right end, after six years of speechification, and memorisking, and resolutions, and remonstrances. Most cordially do we hope the whole community will respond to the call which is now to be made. Every man in India must be fully aware by this time, that nothing is to be expected from England; the Court of Directors will do nothing; and Her Majesty's Ministers will do nothing but help them. Had there been any intention of doing any thing, the strenuous efforts of two such men as Lord William Bentinck and Mr. Gladstone, would not have been so long exerted in vain. Their exertions, however, have done us this service; they have served to open our eyes to the truth, that to depend on any portion of the Government of England, either at the east or west end of the town, is to depend upon a broken reed. The object of the Directors is simply to wear out the spirits by the procrastination of hope. Let us, then, dismiss all idea of obtaining justice from England, and endeavour to do justice to ourselves. Every circumstance which has transpired within the last three years, appears as though it had been specifically designed to simplify our path, and animate us to duty. Three years ago it was deemed indispensable to the success of any comprehensive scheme that it should embrace the communication, both on the European and the Asiatic side; and we were scared from the plan, by the prospect of a boundless expenditure, and endless botheration. But happily the French and English Governments have just entered into a convention, for conveying the Mails through France from London to Constantinople, in fifteen days. We have nothing to do, therefore, but with our own side of the water. Then, again, we were uncertain whether vessels of any description could face the monsoon, seeing how the Bombay Steamers had been constantly driven back; but here, also, the mists of ignorance have been dispelled. Vessels have been constructed in England of such power, that the Atlantic is nothing to them. They have bridged that ocean, and linked England and America together. What the Great Western has done in the Atlantic, a Great Eastern can assuredly do in the Indian ocean. If any shadow of doubt rested on this truth, it has been dispelled by the triumphant voyage made by a sailing vessel, the Water Witch, from Calcutta to Aden, in the very teeth of the monsoon, in thirty-six days. An adequate Steamer, therefore, will keep open the communication from Calcutta at all seasons. An adequate Steamer will take coals for the whole trip, and accomplish it in less time than was required by the last Mail in crossing the country from Bombay.

Let it not be said that one Steamer will do nothing. It will do much; it will give us four, and, possibly, five trips in the year, to Aden or Suez. It will do more; it will attract two or three other Steamers to our port. Open the communication with one vessel, and we shall soon have half a dozen on the line. While we continued to cry out for help, no one came to our assistance. Let us once be independent of foreign aid, and we shall be encumbered with kindness. Even the Court of Directors will then be happy to take the comprehensive scheme under their patronage, and to tell us that nothing was wanting, but the success of the plan, to secure their cordial approbation of it. Let them continue then to lavish on a communication, of which the benefit is confined to one Presidency, the resources which are drawn from another; let us demonstrate that there is public spirit enough in Calcutta and its provinces, to emulate the exertions of those who have called the Great Western and the British Queen into life and activity.

MAP OF UPPER ASSAM, SHOWING THE TEA TRACTS DISCOVERED BY MR. C. A. BRUCE: BY J. B. TASSIN.—This is a very elegant and useful contribution by Mr. Tassin, not only to the geography, but also to the agricultural and commercial interests of India. As such we recommend it to public patronage. It is our intention to go over it very carefully, with Mr. Bruce's report; and we advise all others to do the same, who wish to have a correct idea of the present state of tea cultivation in Assam, and of the means and opportunities of its future extension.

ADMISSION OF BARRISTERS INTO THE SUDDER DEWANY ADALAT.—During the past week, some sensation has been created by the first appearance of Mr. Leith, a barrister of the Supreme Court, in the Sudder Dewanny Adalat, the Chief Native Court in these Provinces, to act in his professional capacity. The established pleaders in that Court, with the exception of two European gentlemen, have unanimously objected to the innovation; and have been accordingly charged, by a portion of the Press, with being actuated by mean and selfish motives. We could have wished, that in a public question of this nature, every thing bordering on personal allusion, and all questioning of motives had been carefully excluded. The true merits of the case can be ascertained only by a calm and impartial examination. The business of this Court was formerly conducted in the Persian language, for which the Hindoostanee has been latterly substituted. For many years after its establishment, all cases brought before it were managed exclusively by Natives of the country, Hindoo or Mahomedan. This monopoly was gradually disturbed, by the admission of European pleaders, at the discretion of the Court; and it was at length entirely demolished by Reg. XII. of 1833, which threw open the bar to all classes, without reference to colour, country or creed. But as the majority of the pleaders still continued to be Natives of India, it has been usual to require all pleaders to adopt the Native language; and, however absurd it may have been to see a gentleman like Mr. Sutherland standing at the bar and talking Hindoostanee to Mr. Rattray or Mr. Hutchison, there was just and sufficient reason for confining the pleadings to a language, with which all the practitioners were more or less familiar. If the European pleader on one side, who understood Hindoostanee, had been at liberty to plead in English, it would have given him an undue advantage over the Native pleader of the opposite party, who was totally ignorant of that language; not to add, that however well versed the Judges may be in the Native tongue, it is impossible but that they should comprehend the statement of a case when delivered in their mother tongue with more rapidity and clearness than when a foreign language is used.

The appearance of Mr. Leith, a barrister of the Supreme Court, ignorant of the Native language, in the Sudder Dewanny, raises a new question, and calls for a new decision. The established pleaders object to the admission of any practitioner, who does not possess the qualification of a knowledge of the Native languages, which has hitherto been demanded of all candidates; and the question now to be decided is, whether an innovation shall be made in the practice of the Court, by admitting gentlemen to plead, who are ignorant of Hindoostanee. And as Mr. Leith, if admitted to practice occasionally at the bar, would claim to address the bench in English, the question in reality is, whether English pleadings are to be admitted or not. This question again can be decided only by determining whether the object for which the Court is constituted, namely, the speedy administration of justice, is likely to be retarded or promoted by the admission of European barristers and English pleadings. We think it plain, that in every case in which one party may retain a Native pleader, the advocate of the opposite party should be required to plead in the Native language, that both parties may be placed upon an equality; for although a man who may be rich enough to employ a European barrister, would also associate with him Native agents to put him fully in possession of the case of the opposite party; the man who is obliged, through poverty, to resort to a Native pleader, has not the means of giving his representative a knowledge of what the English barrister may advance. One party would thus enjoy an advantage denied to the other. But where barristers, of whom English is the mother tongue, are employed on both sides, the ends of justice would, in our apprehension, be best promoted, by allowing them to plead in the English language. In this case to insist upon the use of a language less familiar to the Judge and the pleaders, than their own, would only be to throw an obstacle in the way of speedy justice. We are inclined to think that the rule adopted in the trial of Pertab Chand, at Hooghly, may be considered a case in point. Government thought fit to engage a European gentleman of large attainments, (with no mean knowledge of the Native languages,) to conduct the prosecution; and it was deemed equitable to allow the prisoner a corresponding advantage. Mr. Leith was, therefore, at once admitted to act as his counsel, without passing an examination before Mr. Curtis, in the Hindoostanee language. Why should not the same privilege be extended to all classes of society in cases exactly similar; that is, in cases in which the opposite counsel, though master of the Native tongue, may be an Englishman? There appears, moreover, greater reason for admitting this practice in the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, where the Judges are Europeans, than there was for allowing it in a Court, meaning that of Hooghly, in which one of the Judges was a Native. The Supreme Native Court has, therefore, only to modify the present rule, by admitting the principle, that when the advocates on both sides are Europeans, the pleadings may be in English; when the advocates on one side is a Native, they shall be in the Native tongue.

It is extremely desirable that European practitioners should be more extensively employed in the Native Courts. Though it may be considered by some as a descent on their part, of this we are certain, that it would tend, in an ordinary degree, to raise and improve the Courts, and to stop the current of corruption. Though they might not be much the better for practising in the Courts, the Courts would be much the better for them. Few of the Native Officers would venture to practice those little arts, by which causes are delayed or advanced to suit their pecuniary interests, when a European pleader was at hand to expose them. The confidence of the public would be drawn to these tribunals; and even the Judges themselves would imperceptibly feel the beneficial influence inseparable from the presence of men of integrity, firmness and knowledge in their Courts. English history abundantly proves, that it is the independence of the bar which has improved the character of the Bench, and increased its dignity in public estimation.

BURMESE AFFAIRS.—We are happy to learn from the latest Moulmein papers, that all fears regarding the safety of Dr. Richardson have been dispelled, by his safe return to that place. The object of his journey to Siam has also been, to a considerable extent, accomplished; and the importation of cattle, now rendered more than ever necessary, by the presence of so large a body of ox-eating English soldiers at Moulmein, has been revived. The latest intelligence from Rangoon is to the effect, that Capt. Macleod, the Officiating Resident at Ava, who was driven from thence by the rise of the Irrawaddie, was residing at Rangoon, amidst every demonstration of respect from the local authorities. Our Moulmein contemporary is a little surprised, that the British Government should thus pocket the insult which Tharrawaddie has cast on it, by the contemptuous treatment of the British Representative at his Court; and enquires whether the insult will not be resented. Pretending to no extraordinary knowledge of the designs of Government, especially since the Deputy Governor thought fit to look up the young Civilians, and set them to copy all the public dispatches relative to the Burmese affairs,—but, judging from the present aspect of things, we may say with confidence, that there will be no war. It is now evident that Tharrawaddie has no intention of going to war with us; that all he desires is, to relieve his Court from the barbarous eye of a British Envoy, and to place himself on the same scale of dignity with his royal brethren at Bangkok and Hue, and with the Emperor at Peking, whose capitals are not darkened with the shadow of a Resident. He has accomplished his object. He has rid himself of our minister, by a stroke of passive resistance, worthy of the great Daniel himself; and having performed this achievement, he has no idea but that of quietly enjoying his throne. It was supposed at the outset of his career, that he was thirsting for revenge on the English; that his first aim would be to recover the provinces wrested from his predecessor, and to restore the integrity of the empire of Alahmra. But either he has become better acquainted with his own comparative weakness, or we with his designs; for no such intention is now, we believe, imputed to him; and we have, therefore, no occasion for a war. Of course, if a single company of Burmese troops were to cross the limit which divides his empire from ours, he ceases to reign. Nothing can be easier than a Burmese campaign. We have only to land at Rangoon, and debouch on the Irrawaddy, through the Aeng Pass, and march to the capital with all the haste in our power, and the campaign is over, and we become Lords of the Burmese empire, with two neighbours, the Siamese and the Chinese, to vex us, instead of one. The success of a war in Burmah would depend, of course, on the foresight of the Commissariat; it would be a question of cash, rather than of courage; and, therefore, it is not likely to take place yet. Our resources require to be husbanded for the second struggle which England will, probably, be called to fight for her own liberties, and those of the world, with the monster of Russian despotism. That war will be brought nearer to our eastern frontiers than the war with Napoleon; and until the European problem of Constantinople is settled, and the Western horizon is again clear, it would be an act of political folly for the British Government to entangle itself unnecessarily in the East. As long as Nepal and Burmah remain quiet, so long shall we. The accounts which those Courts have opened with us, will, doubtless, be settled some day; meanwhile they may run on at interest, without much risk to our credit.

THE POWER OF THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OVER ACTS OF PARLIAMENT.—Our observations of last week have elicited a few remarks from the Hurkara, which, considering the importance of the subject, and the earnestness with which Government has been denounced, have not a little disappointed us. Our contemporary states, "that we have buckled on our armour to do battle in defence of the right and capacity of the Local Government to repeal Acts of Parliament." This is scarcely a fair statement of the case. The question at issue is, the construction of an Act of Parliament, and need not have called up any hostile feelings. If Parliament did intend by the New Charter Act to invest the Local Legislature with new powers; and to delegate to it the task of repealing, modifying and altering Parliamentary enactments, then the Legislative Council has not exceeded its powers. If such was not the intention of the British Legislature, the Local Legislature ought to be deposed; and no language of vituperation which the Hurkara has adopted from time to time, can be considered too strong to characterise its audacity. We have all along been led to adopt the opinion, that it was the distinct and unequivocal intention of Parliament, whether out of a peculiar tenderness for India, or a still greater tenderness for itself, to confer such power, however great and unusual, on our Local Legislature; and that the proceedings of the Legislative Council, by which Acts of Parliament have been modified and repealed, were not treasonable, but constitutional. We will not repeat our arguments of last week, but simply notice the two objections which our contemporary takes to them. We had said that, if Parliament did not intend to give this general power over its own preceding Acts to our Legislature, it would not have specified certain Acts which that Legislature was not to touch; and that any other interpretation would fix on the Great Council of the Nation the absurdity of a most glaring tautology. Our contemporary is much amused with this argument, and puts it in a very entertaining point of view; because of all the books that ever have been, or ever can be, compiled, the Statutes at Large, are most chargeable with the sin of tautology. We are well aware that the Acts of Parliament, which constitute the law of England, though seriously believed to contain the very quintessence of reason, afford the most abundant food for ridicule; but the tautology to which we alluded, would have been something even more ridiculous than the usual verbal tautology for which those Acts are so conspicuous. It would have been a tautology calculated to call in question even the sanity of the law makers. To have declared certain statutes exempt from the legislative authorities of India, when Parliament meant all along to exempt all statutes, without distinction, from their power, would have been the very climax of absurdity; and until our contemporary can bring some brighter explanation of this enactment, we must continue to think that this exemption had some object; and that the object was to leave all Acts, not exempted; to be dealt with by the Council.

Our contemporary thinks that, as the Council here is restricted from altering any Act passed since 1834, for the government of India, it would, upon our reading of the Charter, be at liberty to repeal all other Acts. Most undoubtedly it would. If the Legislative Council were regularly once every year to devote a whole day to repealing all the Acts passed by the Imperial Legislature during the year, which did not affect India, it would not do that which was illegal; but it would do that which was very absurd. That it has a right to perpetrate such an absurdity, there can be no question. It may repeal all the turnpike and rail-road Acts at one blow. It may do more; it may repeal annually all the Acts passed by the Emperor of Japan; and the only reason why it does not do so, is, doubtless, the fear of being invested with a strait-waistcoat, and made over to the Lunatic Asylum at Bhowmipore. But this does not prove that the Council has not been endowed with power to vary Acts of Parliament, which refer to the East, and which were passed before the currency of the present Charter.

The Hurkara thinks that the throwing overboard the petition against the Black Act, was not an acknowledgement, that the power which had been exercised did legally reside in the Council. Why, then, is not the matter again brought distinctly before Parliament? It yields, we are sure, in importance to none. Parliament will not surely refuse to explain one of its own Acts, especially when it is told that upon that explanation depends the question, whether its authority shall be honoured or despised by eighty millions of people. Why cannot a meeting be got up for this simple and specific purpose, to beseech the Imperial Parliament to declare, for the comfort and satisfaction of Her Majesty's lieges sojourning in the East, whether it was or was not its intention to confer on the Council so important a power?

THE TENASSERIM PROVINCES.—We regret to have neglected at the time, to republish from the Moulmein Chronicle, of the 31st of July last, the statistical returns of the population, resources and expenditure of the provinces on the Tenasserim Coast, which were obtained from the Burmese by the treaty of Yandaboo. We have given them in a subsequent column.

The first observation to which they naturally give rise, is the extraordinary sparseness of the population, compared with the extent of the territory. It extends along the sea coast, for 400 miles, and stretches into the interior in proportions varying from 30 to 70 miles. But the inhabitants do not exceed one hundred and twelve thousand, scarcely the tenth of a moderate-sized district in Bengal. Here we have presented to us, the spectacle of a large country, with safe and spacious harbours, with a rich and productive soil, capable not only of supporting a dense population, but also of furnishing the material of a large export to other countries, with superior facilities for the construction of vessels to transport its redundant products, enriched with mineral treasures,—but virtually a desert. In these provinces, it is not nature, but man, that is wanting. With an adequate population they would soon rival in productiveness and wealth, the most envied districts of the empire. To secure the acquisition of population, however, must be the work of many years of mild and equitable administration. It is only as the British Government can present such a picture of liberal policy, as shall allure settlers from the provinces which are exposed to the oppressions of Burmese despotism, that any chance exists of seeing this coast filled with an active and industrious population. Every motive of policy, therefore, combines with the call of benevolence, to urge on us the duty of giving to these districts a system of government worthy of the British name.

It must appear strange and anomalous, that so insignificant a population should possess so large an apparatus of Government. Comparing the extent of population in our Bengal districts, with the official authorities placed over them, we are led by analogy to the conclusion, that about one-third of a Civilian would be sufficient for the management of the hundred thousand people who occupy the Three provinces. Indeed, when the expense of defending them is taken into the account, as well as the inadequacy of their revenues, it must appear scarcely worth the while of Government to maintain a dominion at such cost, over a tract of country so poorly inhabited. But, happily for the welfare of that country, we cannot relinquish the management of it, however small its intrinsic value, without affording a triumph to the Court of Ava, which would inevitably render Bengal insecure. Thus, by the obligations of political necessity, we are constrained to keep possession of provinces, in which we are far more necessary to the well being and improvement of the people, than they are necessary for our importance and dignity. It is impossible to account for our position along that coast, without a direct reference to the economy of divine Providence, by which the movements of politicians are overruled to nobler ends than they had any conception of. In that country, of which the population scarcely exceeds that which may be found on either side of some streets in London the British Government is detained, apparently against its own pecuniary interest, in order that these wilds may become the seat of an industrious and happy people; may be transformed into smiling fields, and be studded with cities and towns; that its archipelago of islands may become the scene of active fisheries; that its vast forests of timber may be hewn down and turned into a commercial navy; that the silence and solitude of its woods may be exchanged for the busy hum of a cheerful and thriving population;—and that the everlasting gospel, the sole remedy for the moral miseries of man, driven out of the Burmese dominions, may there obtain a shelter on the outskirts of that empire, till, in the course of events, facilities shall arise for spreading its divine influence throughout that region.

The account of the public receipts and expenditure furnishes little matter for remark. The revenue, as compared with the number of tax-payers, is one-third heavier than that of India. Here we have, in round numbers, a country, with ninety millions of people, yielding a revenue of two hundred lakhs of Rupees, a little more than two Rupees a head. There, taxation falls at the rate of a little more than three Rupees to each individual.<sup>6</sup> Here, more than three-fourths of the revenue is derived from a direct land-tax; in the Tenasserim Provinces the land yields only one-third of the aggregate revenue. The expenditure of the Provinces, if we exclude the charge of troops, is rather less than the income. The troops, however, must be considered not so much an essential part of the provincial establishment, as a check upon the designs of Tharrawaddee. Their presence arises from political considerations, which enhance the safety of the whole empire; and their expenditure ought, therefore, to be regarded as a political, rather than a provincial charge. When this is added to the general expense, the excess of outlay over income, is about ten lakhs of Rupees a year.

From whence does this fund come? From the exuberant wealth of the Gangetic Provinces. Those who are accustomed to look at this magnificent empire in the gross, and not in detail, can form but an imperfect idea of it. They regard it, as one vast territory, extending from within a few miles of the borders of China to the Indus, and, perhaps, a little farther; from the snows of the Himalaya to Cape Comorin; yielding an income, second only to that of England and France; feeding an extensive commerce, and supporting a splendid establishment in Leadenhall Street. But to form a correct notion of the actual condition of this empire, of the relation of its parts to the whole, let the reader contract his vision to the rich valley watered by the Ganges and the Jumna; let him fix his attention on that fertile plain, though it forms but a sixth part of the whole, now studded with towns and villages, and intersected with an endless net-work of streams and rivulets; and then let him realize the idea, that it is this valley which furnishes all the redundant wealth of the Company's treasury. As his eye runs along this valley from Hurdwar to the sea, let him reflect, that this is the garden of India; this is the source of all the wealth and importance of the East India Company. Were the resources of these provinces abstracted from the general revenues, Government could not hold India a twelvemonth, without falling into the gulf of bankruptcy. It is this Gangetic valley, which props up Bombay; which supports the settlements in the Straits; which supplies the deficiencies of the provinces wrested from the Burmese. It is this Gangetic valley, which maintains the steam communication between India and Egypt; which pays the dividends in England; and which remits two millions sterling a year to the governing body at home.

MISSIONARY CHURCHES.—The Baptist Denomination holds the same principles of church order as the Congregationalists, and differs from them chiefly by a more rigid adherence to their common rule. Consequently the two denominations exercise a great influence on each other: and they are both alike influenced by the other religious bodies around them—as by the Episcopalians in keeping alive attention to their constitutional principles, and by the Methodists in stimulating their zeal and activity in the furtherance of the gospel. Of late there has arisen another body which acts upon them as the Episcopalians, but in another direction. We mean the people called the Plymouth Brethren; who, fleeing from the Episcopalian extreme, of exalting the officers of the Church till they are wholly substituted for the Church itself, have run to the opposite extravagance of discarding official order altogether, and reducing the church to a shapeless, unorganized mass of confusion. Between these two extreme bodies, both assailing them in earnest controversy, the Congregationalists and Baptists, walking in a middle path, are set to examine, with renewed care, every part of their order and discipline: and they cannot but benefit largely by the examination. Mr. Clarke, of Truro, in the Baptist Magazine for May, thus expresses a conviction, which we believe to be now very general amongst the Baptists and Congregationalists: "The interests of Christ's Kingdom require, at this juncture especially, that all our institutions should be reviewed and modified, according to the standard of scripture authority." Nothing but greater purity of doctrine and practice can be anticipated from such a process; and in the bodies of which we are speaking, there is as little as can well be in any associations of men to render that impracticable or unwelcome.

It is easy to understand, then, that if the Congregationalists advance in the progress, which we shewed, in our last paper on this subject, they have already commenced, towards the abandonment, or at least the modification, of the economy of Societies, and an adherence to ecclesiastical order in effecting those great purposes for which the Church was instituted by its Divine Founder, the Baptists will naturally partake of the reform. Their Home Missions, Colonial Missions, and Missions to the Heathen will, in like manner, come under the special care of the churches, singly or associated, as circumstances may recommend. Indeed, it would be an injustice to think, that the Baptist Churches are behind those of the Congregationalists on this vital question. We are persuaded that though they may have as yet made fewer, or less remarkable, public demonstrations on the subject, they are generally more prepared for the change we hope to see effected in the proceedings of both bodies. We know it to be an idea familiar to the conductors of the Baptist Home Missionary Society—which they have very freely expressed on the platform of their public meetings—that their Society is a reproach to the churches of the Denomination; for were they to do their duty, its existence would be unequalled for: and its most legitimate object, which is to be sought with all its might, is its own extinction. This principle we have heard expounded with the greatest boldness and force; and it is no less just than bold. Most of the Baptist County Associations are proceeding to act in accordance with it; and, in proportion as they do so, it will be found that there is nothing in Foreign Missions to require an artificial, extra-ecclesiastical system of management more than in the Home Missions: but much loss is sustained by them, through their anomalous relation to the Christian Church.

In surveying the present aspect of the different religious communities at home, in respect of their principles of action for the conversion of men, it would be inexcusable to pass by the Wesleyan Methodists. There is no denomination of Christians more largely engaged in the great enterprise of the gospel; and, from the beginning, whatever they have done, has been done by their collective body. On both these grounds, therefore, it is fit we should look at their proceedings. But we shall postpone it for the present, as we have received a letter of remonstrance on the sentiments we expressed some time back, respecting the Centenary excitement and subscriptions, which we hope to find room for next week, and which will lead us necessarily to state our views of the Methodist system.

In the meantime we would glance at the position of the Church of England. From every part of it we may hear the doctrine now proclaimed, that it is to the Church the evangelization of the world belongs. So far, therefore, the question is settled, that nothing farther has to be done for giving prevalence to the doctrine we have advocated, amongst the Episcopalian party. The matter there hinges at the reduction of the doctrine to practice: and to that there are very serious obstructions. The question is, therefore, agitated with much earnestness: How must a Society be constituted, so that it may be identified with the Church as a legitimate portion of its organization, and carrying out its principles in evangelical exertions? The supporters of the existing Church Societies are at variance, respecting the claims of those Societies to be considered institutions of the Church. The orthodox par excellence base their argument upon the text, not of Scripture, but of Ignatius, "Let nothing be done without the bishop, in matters pertaining to the church." Some of them, more zealous as partisans than consistent as Episcopulians, maintain, with the Bishop of London, that the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, the Incorporated Societies for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and for Building and Enlarging Chapels, the National School Society for the Education of the Poor, and the Society for Supplying Additional Curates in Populous Places, are "framed in strict accordance with the principles of our ecclesiastical polity;" whilst the Church Missionary Society, and similar Associations are not. The essential distinction between the two classes they take to be, that the Archbishops and Bishops are ex-officio Directors of the former classes, but not of the latter. The Church Missionary Society, for example, does not require, by its constitution, that even a single Bishop should be connected with its management: and it is a mere accident, that a respectable number of the Bishops do take part in its councils. Their continuing to do so, however, must depend upon the will of the Society, as expressed by the vote of a popular assembly. In the Venerable and Incorporated Societies, on the contrary, the Bishops take their place amongst the Directors by virtue of their episcopal office, without leave or licence of the Societies at all.

But this distinction, which appears so important and conclusive in the eyes of those who have drawn it, is thought nothing of by others, who appear to be the better logicians. They maintain that there is not one of the existing Societies which, by its constitution, is a Church Society: and the gist of their argument is, that none of them were at first formed and constituted by proper ecclesiastical authority, and none of them allows any ecclesiastical jurisdiction or superiority to the Bishops in the direction of their affairs. The vote of every one-guinea member is as good and effective as that of the Archbishop of Canterbury; and thereby the inferior clergy and laity are raised to a level with their spiritual overseers, to the scandal of all order. "Hence," says a very able Correspondent of the British Magazine, "arise those miserable quarrels in the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, from whose meetings the bishops have been forced to retire."

The doctrine of this party is, that a general synod of the Church alone can constitute a Church Society for a whole national church; a provincial council alone can constitute it for a province, or a diocesan synod for a diocese. Wistful looks, therefore, are cast both to America and Scotland, where the Episcopal Churches, free from the trammels of State patronage and authority, carry out this doctrine in practice, to their great comfort and usefulness. And the bondage of the Church of England is mourned over in such terms as these: "Considering the present condition of our Church with relation to the State, till we shake off our fetters, we must not hope for councils or synods. Although, therefore, our spiritual overseers are disunited from their lawful counsellors, and the corrusa presbyterii is wanting to them, although pains and penalties of the civil law forbid the 'Church's senate,' as St. Jerome calls it, to assemble, yet this should but increase our readiness to acknowledge, by our actions, the divine authority indelibly inherent in the united voice of the bishops of a province, or national church."* This is marvellous language from the pen of a churchman. It means that the Episcopal Church of England has parted with its episcopal character and constitution, for the sordid pay and baronial honours conferred by the State—that by the terms of this bargain, the Bishops are prohibited from holding all such ecclesiastical assemblies as are necessary for identifying any benevolent and evangelical effort with the Church—and that, consequently, nothing better can be done, than that the Bishops should form themselves into a spiritual Council, with no authority but that derived from the sacredness of their office, take upon themselves to specify what objects the members of the Church should adopt, to enjoin congregational collections for those objects, and appoint Committees to apply the contributions of the Church to their promotion.

It remains to be seen, whether the Bishops are sufficiently united in mind and doctrine to act together in this way—whether the clergy and laity are prepared to recognize this two-fold ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Bishops—and whether such a scheme will satisfy the concern awakened in the Episcopalian body, to attain conformity to rule in the operations of Christian benevolence.

It is sufficient for us to note the fact, that none of our Protestant denominations appear to be satisfied with their present mode of operation; and that in the midst of all their distinctive peculiarities, there is a general tendency to fall back from expedients to principles. The tendency appears to us to betoken much good. It will lead, we believe, to a sifting and winnowing of dogmas and systems, by which the church universal will gain much in doctrinal purity, and instrumental efficiency.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3.

The disappointment occasioned by the departure of the Berenice, without our Mails, has kindled a flame in Calcutta. H. M. P. has drawn up a spirited letter of remonstrance to Government, and a requisition to the Sheriff to convene a meeting of the inhabitants on the occasion, obtained 725 signatures in forty-eight hours.—A correspondent of the Herkara complains, that Persian, banished as it has been from all courts, civil, criminal and fiscal, still lingers in the Salt Department, which thus enjoys a double monopoly.—Act XXIII. of 1839, has just passed the Legislative Council, and become law. It is intended to remedy the inconveniences which arose from the abolition of flogging in the Native Army, and allows Courts Martial to sentence sepoy to imprisonment, with, or without hard labour, for periods varying from six months to two years, according to the nature of the Court ordering the sentence.—The Herkara of this morning states, that farther enquiries made by the Editor, give confidence to the report that the Directors intended to augment the officers of the Native Army, by sending out a batch of eight hundred cadets forthwith.—Sir Edward Rynn, our Chief Justice, after having visited the public schools at Ghazepore, Benares and Allahabad, has, at length, reached Agra, where he was received, with a salute, and immediately began a close inspection of the College in that city.—The Deputy Governor returned to Calcutta on the 1st. It was His Honor's intention to have taken a cruise of eight or ten days in the Cowsey; but after that vessel and the Steamer had run together some distance down the Bay, the Deputy Governor changed his mind, and returned to Calcutta.—At a general meeting of Proprietors, held at the Union Bank, Mr. G. J. Gordon was appointed Secretary in the room of Col. Yonge.—The Commercial Advertiser has published a report, that as the Treasury Bismek has forsaken the waning fortunes of Pertab Chand, three barristers of the Supreme Court had generously determined to take up and carry on his cause gratis.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 4.

The Joudhpore affair, for the settlement of which a large body of troops has been assembled, is disposed of amicably.

There will be no fighting. The gallant storming of Ghinai will, probably, save us a war with Nepal, as it has one with Joudhpore. Maun Sing, the Rajah, has knuckled down, and come to terms. He has placed himself and his kingdom at the disposal of the Governor General. He came forward with a small body of about four hundred horse to meet Col. Sutherland, and put his signature to whatever treaty Government might dictate.—England has lost her young Giraffe, and India has gained one. One of the vessels which has lately come in from the Red Sea, has brought a beautiful Giraffe. It is said that there are three candidates for the animal, the present Rajah of Burhwan, the agent of the new ruler of the Punjab, and some American speculators.—The Rev. Mr. Ward, the Chaplain at Poona, has just preached a 'brilliant and impressive sermon' at that station, on the conquest of Calul, which has greatly displeased the Editor of the Bombay Gazette.—The Bombay Times of the 19th September, publishes the following sentiment, than which that paper has never uttered one more true. "There never will be a good understanding between Bombay and Calcutta, so long as the former is made the head quarters of the Red Sea Steamers."—The Enterprise Steamer, which is just come in from Madras, experienced a severe gale on the 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th ultimo, which leads to the conclusion, that the equinoctial gale felt here, was the gale of the season, which we annually expect. In that gale fourteen boats belonging to the Superintendent of Police went down irrecoverably, off Baulash, with all the records of the office; and the list of all the rogues and suspected persons in Bengal. Doubtless, the dishonest part of the community will think that it is "an ill wind that blows nobody good."—The Madras Court is in an uproar, by the anticipated appointment of an Attorney to the situation of Registrar, about to be vacant by Mr. Cator's departure; the barristers considering this post the exclusive perquisite of their cloth.—An equal hubbub has just been created here, by an attempt, on the part of our Supreme Court Barristers, to obtain an entrance to the bar of the Supreme Native Court; for particulars, see our editorial notice.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5.

Intelligence has been received of the atrocious murder of Col. Herring, commanding the 37th N. I. in Afghanistan. He proceeded with his Regiment to escort a large treasure from Candahar to Cabul. When about fifty miles from this latter place, he incautiously walked out, unarmed, with only two sepoy and one Havildar; he was suddenly set on by a band of nearly twenty Afghans, and fell with nineteen wounds.—That celebrated character, the rick-wart Pertab Chand, has been playing the same pranks in Calcutta which he has played over the country.—Having become intoxicated, he commanded individuals to be dragged in from the streets and kept in confinement; he strutting about the room with a drawn sword. Mr. McCann, of the Police, was sent to his house, but the man, instead of surrendering himself up to the lawful authorities, aimed a blow at Mr. McCann with his sword, which was happily parried. He was, at length, seized and taken to the Police, where he was bound under heavy recognizances to keep the peace.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 7.

The Equisable, a vessel of about 850 tons, proceeding from Calcutta to New South Wales, was totally lost last Saturday, in going down the river at Futla.—The scarcity in the camp of Calul may be judged of, by the following list of prices obtained at the sale of the articles of the late Colonel Arnold:—Eleven bottles of beer and one of Sherry, 211 Rs. Half a bottle of mustard, 32 Rs. One pine cheese, 54 Rs. A bottle of Harvey's Sauce, 19 Rs. Half a dozen of Claret, 50 Rs. Two wine glasses, 23 Rs.!!—The Adjutant Generalship of the Madras Army has just been conferred on Major Alexander, who vacates the Judge Advocate Generalship.—The Madras papers state, that the Port will soon exhibit a noble show of vessels of war; the Wellington, the Larv, the Favourite, and the Algerine, were expected there in a day or two. Some say the destination of this fleet will be China; but the Local Government will take no step, till furnished with instructions from England.—Three considerable robberies are this day announced as having taken place at Mooredabad.—Our latest intelligence from China extends only to the 27th of June, at a time when our last news from England is of the 16th July.—The meeting held on Saturday, in reference to the non-conveyance of our Mails by the Berastie, was very numerously attended; and it was resolved, after the Petition had been adopted, that twenty or thirty gentlemen should accompany the Sheriff when he presented it.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 8.

Government has very considerably directed, at the suggestion of Mr. Stooqueler, the Editor of the Englishman, that the Overland Mail shall be opened at whatever hour of the night it may arrive, and that the papers addressed to the Editors of the Journals shall be delivered immediately to the messengers in waiting. This will be a great convenience to the news-loving community of the metropolis.—The Bombay Hawk being now due for three days, it is supposed, as usual, that the August Mails may be expected immediately.—The foundation stone of the New Cathedral is to be laid by the Lord Bishop of the diocese, this evening. The forms of prayers to be used have been printed at Bishop's College Press, and will be distributed to the company. The dimensions of the edifice have been somewhat contracted since the original plan was published. They will be about 130 by 60 internally, and 180 by 65 or 70 externally. About six hundred attendants will be accommodated.—Particulars have been received of the loss of the Equitable. The Pilot calculated, as usual, upon finding a sufficient depth of water, for a vessel drawing only thirteen feet six inches, but about half-past five in the afternoon, she suddenly took the ground, and was instantly thrown over on her starboard side, so as to bring half her decks, and even her tops, under the water. The ladies and children were, with difficulty, extricated. The vessel filled immediately, and at high water nothing of her was to be seen. The child of the Captain, and a cabin boy, were, unfortunately lost.—Act, No. XXII. of 1839, has become the subject of litigation. It directs that in all cases of summary conviction, the accused person shall be admitted to make full answer and defence by counsel and attorney. The Magistrates have taken upon themselves to order, that only barristers or attorneys shall be at liberty to plead before them, upon the strength of this Act. This is a harsh and unjust procedure. How is the laicous cooly, or laicous tar, to fee a counsel learned in the law?—The Soldier Amoen of Gya has applied for eighteen months leave of absence, to enable him to go on pilgrimage to Mecca, retaining one-half his salary. He has been informed that his request cannot be granted; and that if he goes to Mecca, he will resign his appointment.—Government has just sanctioned the publication of the public Acts and Regulations in the Oriya language. The poet of translator is to be given away upon the dear digniori principle.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 9.

Mr. Palmer, who has been for some time under trial at the Court of the 24-Pergunnahs, for having harboured Deotis, has been honourably acquitted of the charge. It is suspected to have been brought forward from the worst of motives, as the Native who is his principal accuser is reported to have taken advantage of his absence, to cut down his property of his plant.—The Overland Mail had not arrived last night. Four days' posts are now due from Bombay.—The Steam Tug Association appears to be in a very flourishing condition. At the meeting just held to receive the half-yearly report of receipts and disbursements, it was resolved to give to the new shareholders, a dividend at the rate of between nine and ten per cent. per annum; and to the old shareholders a dividend, at the rate of twenty per cent. a year. The Association finds, however, that the occasional employment of the Government Steamers in tugging vessels whop off duty, interferes with their interests; and they have determined to petition the home authorities to forbid the practice.—The route which Lord Auckland will pursue from Simlah to Mirapore, is given in this paper of this day. One Regiment of Foot, and another of Horse will form the escort. His Lordship expects to be at Delhi, on the 25th of November.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

The Friend of India has again buckled on his armour to do battle in defence of the right and capacity of the local Government, to repeal Acts of the British Parliament; but our readers need not apprehend that we shall enter into a lengthy contest with the Serampore champion of the Indian Government. We shall decline doing so for two reasons; the one that the Government have settled the matter for their own way, and for the matter is passed praying for; it must be decided in England; the other, that all that can be said on the subject, has been said, and a repetition would merely tire the patience of our readers. The local Government in this matter, resemble, be it spoken with reverence, the dummy champion of Lord Eglington's tournament, and when armed and seated on its high horse, when once let loose, rushes down its inclined plane, and the lance of argument is broken against its iron ribs in vain. We must, however, notice one argument, which the Friend of India employs, because it possesses the rare merit of novelty. It says, our contemporary of Serampore, the new Charter be not taken to convey to the Indian Government the power of altering or repealing Acts of Parliament generally, that construction "would fix on Parliament the absurdity of the most glaring tautology." We confess this is what is vulgarly called "a poser." The power conferred on that of Parliament, should be taken to be lodged in the Government of India, because if such power be not admitted, Parliament must be justly charged with tautology; may, to one who has never looked over the statutes at large, appear a convincing argument; but if the Friend, or any one else interested in the subject, will take the trouble to dip a little into those far more voluminous, than luminous tomes, he will find that the "message" which are the most tautological of all the books that were ever printed. If, however, we are to construe an Act of Parliament by its style, or grammar, we can prove to the complete satisfaction of even the Friend of India, that the Government of India have the power of repealing every Act passed by the British Parliament, including the Jamaica Bill, the Education, the Ballot Bill, &c., when they are passed, that may be passed since the "message" as Jonathan has it, of the new Charter Act; for what does the empowering clause say? It says, that the local Government shall be empowered, among other things, to repeal, vary, &c. except, &c. &c. "or any provisions of any act heretofore to be passed in any wise affecting the said Company, or the said territories, or the inhabitants thereof." Now this clearly gives, by implication, the right to repeal, &c., any future Act, &c., but it does not give those which relate to India, for if not, why did not the Act of Parliament merely say, that this Government should have no power to repeal any future Act whatever. To construe this sentence otherwise, would be to "fix on Parliament the absurdity of a most glaring tautology." We are afraid the British Parliament will not be very much flattered by the Friend of India's railing on the Statutes. To prove that a thing must be, by showing that otherwise an Act of Parliament is tautologous, is about as convincing, as to say that it is impossible, that old Lady Carmine's colour would wash off, because if it did, "it would fix on Lady Carmine the reflexion of wearing rouge."

The Friend of India speaks more probably, when he hints that the British Legislature were glad to throw over to a deputy all matters relating to India, to none of which they entertained any affection; but we think the Friend is wrong when he takes it for granted, that the British Legislature have decided either the Black Act question, or any question involving the power of the Indian Government, to repeal Acts of Parliament. It is true that the disgraceful state of abeyance in which the British Legislative authority has remained during the present Session, has caused the Black Act question, so well as many vital national questions, to be either utterly neglected, or dismissed with contempt. But a battle cannot be said to be lost that has never been fought, and when Parliament is again fit for the nation's business, we doubt not to see these, and other not totally unregarded questions, taken into due consideration and put to rights. The Friend might as well say that there should never be a fit and becoming education measure, because the existing India Bill have abandoned the one they proposed to carry, so that because no great measure has been attended to therefore the Black Act is ratified and confirmed.—Beng. Hurk. Oct. 4.

MISSIONARY AND ECCLESIASTICAL MOVEMENTS.

The Rev. R. Davies, of Penang, has left that island for Singapore, and Rev. J. Dyer, of Malacca, has returned to Europe in the pursuit of health.—Rev. J. Schurman, of Benares, arrived in Calcutta during the past month.—Mrs. Piffard, the lady of our excellent brother, the Rev. C. Piffard, arrived safely on the John Fleming on the 23rd ultimo.—Mr. and Mrs. Perkins have left Calcutta for Serampore; they will take charge of the Orphan School at that station, and engage in general Mission labour. We regret, on account of the infant school cause, the absence of Mr. P. from the presidency. A more amiable and indefatigable representative the Society could not have sent out.—The Rev. Mr. Northam and lady are to labour at Koldahagar.—The Bishop of Madras has been seriously indisposed; and he is through the mercy of God somewhat restored.—We understand that Dr. Mill is made Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and that the Rev. Mr. Wilberforce, son of the venerable philanthropist, is selected as Principal of Bishop's College.—We regret to announce the death of Miss Margaret Keith, the only daughter of the Rev. George Keith, the first Pastor of the Union Chapel; she died in London a few months back universally beloved and regretted: she was on the eve of coming as a Missionary's wife to the East, but the Lord has caused her sun to go down while it was yet day. We have noticed her death because the Christian public in India, out of respect for her excellent parent, took a lively interest in the welfare of this Missionary orphan; and though but few may now be living who knew either father or daughter, it will be a melancholy satisfaction to that few to know that the child followed closely in the footsteps of the parent until they have both entered on their glorified state.—The Rev. Messrs. Flower and Clarkson with their wives have arrived safely at Bombay. They are destined for the London Society's Mission at Surat.—The following labourers from the American Board have arrived at Bombay. Rev. Messrs. Burgess, French, and Home, with their wives, and Miss Farrar, formerly of the Bombay Mission.

We feel much pleasure in announcing the return of our excellent friends, the Rev. W. H. Pearce and Mrs. Pearce, of the Baptist Mission, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Tucker, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. Morgan, and Mr. Wenon. The following brethren connected with the Church Mission, also arrived in the same vessel, the Plantagenet.—Rev. J. Innes and lady, and the Rev. Messrs. C. W. Lipp and Krauss. May all our beloved brethren be long spared to labour amongst the heathen. It is quite cheering to see such accessions of strength to the Mission circle. Oh, that God would pour out his spirit from on high, that their labours may be blessed indeed.—The Rev. J. H. Hodgkinson, one of the Missionaries of the American Board in Ceylon, arrived in Calcutta during the month on his way to America, for the benefit of his health.—Cal. Christian Observer.

NEW WORK CONNECTED WITH THE MUSALMAN CONTROVERSY.

We have much pleasure in informing our friends who feel an interest in the religious welfare of the Mussalmans that the Rev. G. Pfander, formerly of the Georgian Mission, is now preparing several works in the Persian language on the most important topics connected with the Christian and Mussalman religions. The first of these, a treatise on the Divinity of Christ and the Trinity, is now ready for distribution; others on important subjects will soon follow. These works are lithographed, not printed, as the Mussalmans have a great objection to printed books. The whole expense of carrying these works through the press has been defrayed by two gentlemen of the Civil Service who feel deeply interested in the conversion of the Mussalmans, and who are quite competent to judge both of the literary and religious adaptation of the works to the end for which they are designed. From the character given of the style and manner of treating the important subjects embodied in these different treatises, we think our Missionary friends might with great advantage set about translating them into the Bengalee and Urdu languages.—Ibid.

We are glad that we have it in our power to lay before our readers the following statistical account of the Transwarin Province.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

SUBSCRIBER COLLECTORS.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—Can you, or any of your readers, kindly say whether Government supports, and pays the teachers of, a College at Benares, or elsewhere, wherein the Hinduoo Shastars, containing the doctrines of their faith, are taught to the students? or whether this has been discontinued? And whether there be in Calcutta any Oriental College supported by Government, and conducted upon the above principles, either in the Sanscrit or Arabic languages?

Your obedient servant,

AN ENQUIRER.

There are Government Seminaries, conducted on this principle, both at Benares and Calcutta.—Editors.

ROMAN NUMERALS.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—I submit that there might be much advantage, and as it seems to me, little difficulty, in establishing throughout all India, the numerical symbols we ourselves use, instead of the vast and perplexing variety of numerical symbols used by the Native. We might thereby reduce the difficulty and the risks of error and found in mutual transactions & account; and the Government might also, by the general subjection of our symbols, be relieved from the necessity of keeping up double sets of accounts, and sometimes of writers, for the English and Native departments of account; and, furthermore, general uniformity is an object of some importance.

As the English system of decimals is, so far as it would be connected with the effect of the proposed measure, the same as that of the Natives, the change would involve only the necessity of each person's learning nine symbols.

I proposed this long ago to the Editor of the Hurkara, who supported the proposal, which, however, has hitherto met the usual fate of proposals submitted in an Indian Newspaper.

Yours,

A MADRAS CIVIL SERVANT.

THE POLICE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

"Clearly a difficult point for Government, that of dealing with these masses; if, indeed, it be not rather the sole point and problem of Government, and all other points mere accidental 'crotchets, superficialities and beatings of the wind.'"

T. CARLYLE.

SIR,—In the rather pithy remarks you put forth in a recent article respecting the inefficiency to do good, and the efficiency to do evil, of the Police, you mention that the Native papers complain rather strenuously that, among the benefits we have conferred on them, security of property is not one; and the question which this suggests is, what are the benefits,—excluding this important benefit,—which we have conferred on them?

It is better,—and there is not much time to lose,—that we should (as the French say) present these questions before the Natives ask them: those questions they already ask are important signs of the times, and indicate (as I have said) the dissolution of that prestige which is the only moral barrier between the ruling power and the populace; and also a tendency, the result of which must be a collision of new theories with old circumstances, and mighty will be the shock of their meeting, unless we substitute the means of conciliation to supersede the tendency to collision. To do this is better than merely strengthening or propitiating the solidity, our only other barrier. We must seek to govern fort bien, rather than bien fort.

But it is through the subject of Police that I would come to my more ulterior subject.

You have well said, that the Police requires a more immediate care than municipal reform, even if successful, would afford. But the immediate care may, perhaps, be united with the general reform; and with this view I would propose that the Native Police in all towns and considerable villages be informed, that on the first occasion of an unresisted robbery taking place in any one of them, at least one-half the Police establishment (including the head) thereof shall be dismissed; and I would have it added, that getting up false evidence* against those rather likely to have committed the robbery, will, in no wise, as at present, satisfy the responsibility which attaches to such unresisted robbery. On the first vacancy which resulted after this (which should be no idle) threat, I would have the people asked, in rather a general manner, whom they would wish to have as their head man; and the object of their choice should, in default of any particular objection, be appointed; and this, with a public explanation that his continuance in office would depend greatly on the good opinion of the community, who (at least all able to read and write) should be consulted on the subject at certain intervals, and in a more more formal and specific, as circumstances should suggest. Six or seven years of a headship, thus constituted, should be almost a sure claim to an immediate Darogahship; and this, without any additional expense to the State, should make the office more valuable and more stimulative of ambition than it otherwise would be. Such well-trying municipal servants might also be excited by the hopes of District Moonshiffs, for which I think they would be more fit than those chosen under the present principles (if there be any) of selection.

In the beginning of the above course of measures, I would have the number and the individual salaries of the Police Poons, &c., increased; and this exigence I would meet by reducing the Poon establishments of the Civil Courts, who might make use of the Post Office, in the conveyance of processes and returns through Moonshiffs and other local functionaries, (call them attestators) to be duly fixed at the proper places. Any judicial officer will be able to follow out this latter idea without my further explanation. The arrangement would also save much time.

And now having given to you a sketch of my system of Police, may I submit a question regarding those proposed by the Police Committee and Mr. Halliday? What new principle of selection have they proposed in lieu of the old principles, under which Darogahs, with the marks of fetters, were entrusted with Police, and Magistrates appointed Thugs as their Cutwale and Jewahewars. My system, at least, proposes a new principle of selection, which cannot be worse than the above; while it makes each subordinate department, as it were, a cradle or school for that above it; and their's seems to me nothing but the old system in a more intense degree; the common-place proposal of more pay being the only essential change, to which, perhaps, may be added, the proposal of still more of the anti-national superintendence under which things have become "as bad as possible;"† and which still is considered so superexcellent.

Yours,

CASSANDRA.

THE RESUMPTION.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—Having read a paragraph in one of the late numbers of the Englishman, proclaiming that, on a production of the proceedings connected with the resumption question before Parliament, and other high authorities in England, by means of the Agent of the Landholder's Society there, every prospect existed of a final triumph in the matter over the Government of this country, I am induced to offer a few remarks on the subject generally, and more especially as taken up by the Landholders of Bengal in their present Association; likewise to enquire what meaning it may be intended to convey, by the expression of "a final triumph over Government," and by that of the "universal feeling of hostility to resumptions" also put forth by the Editor of the above paper.

If it be meant that any of the representations sent home by the Landholders, or made by their Agent in England, and by prejudiced advocates, can have the effect of putting a stop to enquiries, now so far proceeded in by Government, as to the rights of which the public have been so long and fraudulently deprived, I think the Editor either shows his entire ignorance of the subject so prominently thrust forward by him; or else that he has fallen into a more culpable error in a public Journalist in creating, on the ipse dictum of his correspondent, groundless hopes in the breasts of the parties interested, and inducing them thereby to persevere in a useless expenditure, for the establishment of an Agent whose hopes and anticipations, however sincere, must ultimately end in disappointment to those for whose encouragement they are expressed and published.

Surely no person in the least acquainted with the Revenue system of the Lower Provinces, or with the principles on which a permanent settlement was made with the Landholders by Lord Cornwallis, can imagine that a stoppage to resumption, in its present stage, can possibly take place. Such an order would be a positive absurdity, and tantamount to a confession, on the part of originators, that the British Government in India had been settling in one continued course of injustice ever since their acquisition of the country. No reflecting man, surely, can, for a moment, suppose that, because a permanent agreement was entered into between the Zemindars of the settled Provinces, and the Government, as to no future increase of assessment on their lands YAKKA PAYING revenue, and brought on the rent-roll of the State, therefore no investigation or enquiry should ever take place regarding the liability to assessment of lands never exhibited on such rent-roll, and held by individuals paying but a tithe of what would have been justly demanded from them, had not the existence of their possessions, or their liability to assessment, been carefully screened from the view of Government, when forming the generous and liberal compact which they did. Yet here we have the shrewd Editor of the Englishman, and the sapient Edwards, too, proclaiming forth the likelihood of "an end to resumptions." This, indeed, would be finally with a vengeance!

* In regard to the arming of Police Poons, I venture, at risk of some ridicule, to say that bows and arrows are the weapons by which even the most timid can render gang robbery a dangerous service; because the ambush of the party who discharges the arrow may remain secret. All good service against robbery should be rewarded with Friendships, if suitable; and the rewards should be notified in the semi-official educational Gazette.

† However, I must not be so unjust as to omit that they all protest against the union and curbing of Revenue and Police; that statement-like measure of your favorite, L. W. B.; which gives the Tuhadar a close gripe of the Ryot, and enables the Police Collector, at the end of the year, to say that he has few or no defaulters in jail. It is this the union works well, keeping up individual coercion, instead of collective administration, the initiation of which latter is the initiation of itself self-government.

As to the possibility of such a result being accomplished by the exertions of the Landholder's Society, or by any other means, as well might it be attempted to persuade every tax-payer in England or Scotland, who may have continually succeeded in hiding from the observance of the proper officers, their horses and dogs, liable to taxation by the laws of the land; not only that, because they had so long succeeded in doing so, no tax for the future should ever be demanded on account of the dogs and horses thus from year to year concealed; but also, as an additional indulgence for such good faith, the Executive Government should be debarred from ordering any enquiry into the number of dogs and horses, which persons so acting or their heirs, might ever afterwards desire to conceal, or into the amount of loss which might accrue to the State and the public, from the prevalence of such practices.

To the above simple example would the much misrepresented question of resumption, as carried forward by this Government, be found to bear comparison, if ever sifted and enquired into, before a British Parliament. So does it now appear to all disinterested persons who have taken the trouble to examine it; and who from such examination are able to see the real object of a portion, at least, of the Landholder's Society, in raising the outcry they have against proceedings essentially fair and equitable. For be it observed, the prayer of the Society is not merely that they should be secured in their justly acquired rights, but is, in fact, that an interdiction should be made against any enquiry as to whether they, and those whose cause they profess to advocate, have gained possession merely of such rights, or whether, under pretext of them, there may not have been individuals who have cheated the State of resources which would otherwise have been expended for the public good. If their claims be fair, why dread enquiry? If they have dealt with the Government in the same spirit in which Government dealt with them, and been as faithful in the performance of their contracts since, and at the time their possessions were first leased to them, as the Government have been, why dread the light?

If the improvement and welfare of the country be their object, under show of which so many enlightened men have been induced to join their Association, why oppose investigations, which, whilst they never can deprive any one of property or privileges legally held and obtained, will result only in the recovery of public resources, and in definitely settling the question, the elusiveness of which, independent of all other considerations, forms a barrier to the just determination of individual claims, affords an extended field for corruption in our Courts; and by means of such corruption, enables the rich man to set at defiance the just claims of the poor and uninfluential. But, say the Association, and the Press for them, in respect to lands claimed to be exempted from paying their proportion of the general tax, how tyrannically do Government Act, and how unjustly, in now appointing Special Officers to take away our lands (such are the representations made) at a period when it is well known that proof is beyond our reach, and that the documents and title deeds by which we held our tenures have been either lost or destroyed? And this they do, after, by having allowed us to remain in unquestioned possession for near half a century, they had tacitly relinquished all right to advance their claims against us. How mercilessly, and with what impolicy, too, does Government act in the course of such measures as regards our religion and our priesthood, in depriving our Temples and our Idols of the lands granted for their support, and in driving our Priests and their families from the houses and possessions enjoyed by them for successive generations.

Such is the tone and tenor of the remonstrances of the Landholders; and the proceedings of Government being thus misrepresented by them from interested motives in the first instance, and by the public Press from ignorance in the second, numbers of the most respectable part of the community, both Europeans and Natives, come forward to express their opinion of the oppression, want of faith, and impolicy of the Government. They suppose, of course, that the Press must be well acquainted with the merits of the case; and not having themselves time or inclination to enquire further, they give their names and purses to support innumerable instances of fraud and public plunder, which, had they been acquainted with, they could never, as honest citizens, have for a moment dreamt of countenancing. Nay, blinded by the plausibility with which alleged cases of harshness are represented to them, is it not possible that they may unknowingly league themselves with actual perpetrators of detected frauds and impositions, so gross as to make them blush at the idea of their being supposed to be cognisant of them?

But how different, Mr. Editor, are the proceedings of Government, in reality, from the representations made of them by the Landholders and the Press? Illustrations being the order of the day, and our very law codes being filled with them, I may humbly endeavour, by means of one, to describe the question as it now stands between the Government and those of its subjects, who are claiming special privileges and exemptions. We will suppose, then, that a South American takes possession of one of the Islands in the Pacific or Atlantic Ocean, occupied, at the time, by its aborigines; his laws and his system of taxation prevail; and by such, he demands a certain portion of the produce of the soil, of which, in fact, he has become the proprietor. Some generations afterwards, John Smith, an enterprising Englishman, is permitted to establish a factory on the Island, and to carry on trade with the inhabitants. By certain portions of them, and by officers, by right, though not in fact subject to the chief proprietor, his trade is forcibly opposed; and having invested the whole of his capital in it, he is obliged at length to raise a force for its protection. He is permitted to do so by the authorities of the day; and though he had recourse to such a measure at first, merely for the purposes mentioned, he eventually becomes obliged, by a continuance of opposition and injustice towards him, to increase the force once raised, and to take a part, with a view to self-preservation, in the brute and disturbances prevailing amongst contending parties in the Island; and from long to long, he is at last constrained from the same causes to quarrel with the master of the Island, and with the other authorities by whose permission he had at first been enabled to get a footing in the country, in his commercial capacity.

After some time had passed in this state of things, and frequent quarrels and reconciliations had taken place between John and his opponents, the chief proprietor requests him to take the general administration of the principal part of the Island into his own hands. This he at first refuses, but soon sees the necessity for acquiescence; and, accordingly, on agreeing to pay certain stipends to the former master, and some of the other authorities, an immense portion of the Island, and its revenues in fact, is made over to him. Having undertaken this trust, he commences to form regulations for the welfare of his new property, and to collect the rents and taxes to which he had become entitled. All his orders are obeyed, as much as possible, to suit the feelings of the various classes of persons who had become subject to him, and the great advantages of the change of masters are fully admitted.

After a short period he finds, however, an enormous deficiency in his rents; and when the cause is enquired into, he is told that though he had become general proprietor, yet there were certain portions of land within the country given him, from which rent could not be demanded by him. Some of these portions, say the claimants to exemption, have been bestowed by the former masters of the country; and some one who were intrusted with the collection of the revenues for them, have been so kind as to bestow so exempted on ourselves. The rents of the other lands, too, which it could, by no possible contrivance, be attempted to free altogether from assessment, yearly decreased; and all at length, owing to John's ignorance of the country, continued to do so to such an extent, as to place his solvency, and, consequently, the general well-being of his country in considerable danger. Under these circumstances, being very much engaged in contending with foreign enemies, he declared to those who claimed their hands free by grant from rent, that he had not then leisure, or the means of enquiring all at once into their rights; that without such an enquiry before a judicial tribunal he would not interfere for his own. All he then required of them was to submit a true and faithful account of their tenure, stating the extent, how, when, and by whom acquired; and any which were really found to have been obtained before the date on which the whole of the country had been given to him, he would continue, according to the terms of the title, to consider exempted from rent. In his first proclamation on the subject, he fully shewed how doubtful he was of the truth or correctness of the claims against him; and he said, as I thus say, I must have correct statements; no shuffling or changing of names; no false dates or false title deeds; the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, will serve my right, or the ends of justice; and if a contrary course is pursued, or if you fail to give in the statements called for, when I come to enquire into my right, I will at once levy my rents from you. I will not, however, deprive you of the occupancy of your lands, nor will I demand any back rents. All I will enforce will be a reduced rate of rent from the period, or soon after that, on which my power to assess, according to the rules now laid down, has been determined. A. B.

A NEW CHURCH IN LAMBERT.—TO BE MAINTAINED ON THE VOLUNTARY PRINCIPLE, has been erected on ground given by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in Carlisle-street. It contains 1,000 sittings, one-half of which are to be appropriated to the use of the poor. The consecration will take place on Thursday, the 27th instant, and the church will be opened on the following Sunday.—Pat.

NEW CHURCH AT ILLINGTON.—The consecration of St. Stephen's church, New North-road, Illington, took place last week, by the Bishop of London. This church is the last of the three which have lately been erected in that parish by private subscription, and makes the ninth church in the parish, in addition to the parent church and the chapel of ease. It is calculated to hold one thousand persons.—Christ. Ad.

MOVEMENT AGAINST PATRONAGE.—A movement has commenced in the Church for the purpose of securing, by legislative enactment, a power for the people indirectly to choose their own ministers, by some such contrivance as the General Assembly illegally sanctioned under the name of the veto law. We greatly doubt the success of any such movement against formidable opposition in both Houses, as trenching on private rights, and indirectly slaking the foundation of the English Church. The strenuous support of the overwhelming majority of the people would be required. The power of direct election by the people might be thought worth contending for by many; but we doubt whether the great body would join even for this; for the principle of Establishment is essentially the principle of Toryism. However liberal in his views a candidate might be, by making him a minister, with a life appointment, a good stipend, and his own conscience the only measure of the efficiency of his labours would be recognized, or by which he was affected, the Liberal candidate would very soon become a Tory minister. Among Dissenters, who candidates must not only be popular with the people, but after he is appointed minister, he must exert himself to the utmost to continue popular; otherwise his people will leave him, his income will be lessened, and his respectability greatly impaired in the eyes of his brethren and of the public at large. This difference, we suspect, is now clearly seen by a large proportion of the people; and, therefore, we are very sceptical as to their joining in any movement of ecclesiastical matters, unless it were in favour of the Voluntary principle, which is unquestionably making rapid progress even in the ranks of the Church. It is scarcely necessary to state that the Dissenters would not join in the projected movement; many of them believe that appointment by the people, combined with payment by the State, would lead to the most injurious consequences. The opponents of the movement, active and passive, might be summed up thus:—First, nine-tenths of the common people in connexion with the Church of Scotland; second, nine-tenths of the Dissenters; third, nine-tenths of the Tory constituency; fourth, nineteen-twentieths of the Episcopalians; fifth, one-fourth part of the Whig constituency belonging to the Church—making in all at least seven-eighths of the numbers, wealth, and intelligence of the country. With such fearful odds to contend against, we suspect the small but zealous band of antipatronage men have little chance of carrying any measure in Parliament, even if they were united among themselves, which they are not. Even in Dr. Chalmers's committee, small as it is, there has been a split; and it is understood Mr. Hope Johnson, M. P., and Dr. Muir, of St. Stephen, two of its most influential members, have already resigned.—Scotsman.

The Memorial and Remonstrance of the Scottish Central Board, for vindicating the right of Dissenters.
MR. LORD.—The members of the Scottish Central Board, and the whole body of Dissenters in Scotland, were highly gratified by the announcement some time ago made by your lordship in your place in Parliament, that it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to allow the patent for printing the Holy Scriptures to expire, and not to renew it in favour either of individuals or of corporations.

Although we saw no necessity for the establishment of a censorship of the press in regard to the Sacred Volume, any more than in regard to any other book, we were not disposed to offer opposition to any reasonable arrangement which Government might think necessary for suppressing incorrect or corrupt editions, believing that any board to whom that power might be committed, would be constituted irrespective of religious opinions, and would not have such powers conferred upon it as might defeat the great object in view.

These being our expectations, founded on the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons and your lordship's previous declaration, we have heard with great regret and disappointment the announcement made by your lordship in regard to the constitution and powers of the proposed board, and beg leave humbly but earnestly to remonstrate with your lordship on the subject.

To commit to any board the exclusive right of printing Bibles themselves, or allowing others to print them, and to require all who may wish to engage in this honourable branch of trade to employ a corrector of the press nominated by the board, and to obtain its imprimatur before issuing a single copy, is, we humbly conceive, entirely at variance with the principle formerly announced, and involves powers which, with whatever restrictions they are accompanied, might be exercised in the most arbitrary and partial manner, to the great injury of individuals and of the public good.

This objection receives additional force from the constitution of the proposed board, which in itself, and apart from its powers, is highly objectionable, and we must be permitted to say insulting to Dissenters. It infers that none but ministers or members of the Church of Scotland can be trusted with powers to superintend the purity of the text; that ministers and members of other denominations might be tempted to sanction deviations from the standard version;—it adds to the liveliest distinctions among religious denominations already too numerous, and the sources of much injury to religion, and confusion in the State;—it gives in effect, and for the first time, to the Established Church the entire control of the printing of the Scriptures;—and the whole scheme is calculated, in our opinion, to defeat the great end which Dissenters have ever had in view in interesting themselves in this matter—the securing to the people of Scotland, and especially the poor, an abundant supply of cheap Bibles.

That your lordship could have contemplated the plan in this light, we do not for a moment imagine; and on being made aware, as we can most confidently affirm, that it will occasion disappointment and dissatisfaction to the great mass of the community, that it will obstruct the free production of copies of the Scriptures, and that it will tend to excite feelings already sufficiently excited, we feel assured that your lordship will see cause to abandon the measure, and revert to some such arrangements as proposed in the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, which notwithstanding the objections to which it was liable, was unspeakably superior, in our view, to that now proposed by her Majesty's Government.

We are, in the name of the Board,

Your lordship's most obedient humble servants,

(Signed) A. A. TAYLOR, Treasurer, (Chairman.

JAMAICA.—A correspondent in this island writes as follows:—The Baptists have commenced the grand scheme of preparing young men of this island to send on a mission to Africa.

They have already raised 1000*l*. for the purpose, and they are now establishing a school for the training of these young men. They are indeed an indefatigable body of Christians. Oh! that all societies would unite to evangelize brought Africa!—Christ. Adv.

JAMAICA.—Letter from the Rev Mr. Knibbe to Dr. Hoby, dated 22nd April, 1839.—"We have had some interesting meetings in Kingston and St. Thomas-in-the-Vale respecting Africa, which have rejoiced our heart, and which will I hope lead to some triumphant result. But what will my brother say? how will his heart expand! how will he bless the Lord when I tell him that the first Missionary is now in Africa, proclaiming salvation through the blood of Christ! Oh, 'tis glorious! Yes, while we have been talking, a beloved brother, one of the despised and traduced black Christians who have been so defamed, an African by birth, has left this island (Jamaica), taking with him only a letter of recommendation from his late pastor, brother Gardner; has worked his passage to Africa, and without any support or countenance, except from God, is now on the spot from whence he was stolen when a boy, telling his fellow-countrymen the name of Jesus. O my soul! bless thou the Lord. My heart is too full—I can scarcely write for tears of joy. May God bless Thomas Keith, for that is the name of the honored man. He has written one letter, which I have not time to show you. He knows Greek or Latin, but he knows and feels that Jesus died to save sinners, and in the spirit of an apostle he has gone to proclaim his precious name. A pious medical gentleman in the navy now in the island, or rather in one of Her Majesty's ships, who is just from Africa, saw Thomas Keith there; he appears very warmly to enter into the subject.

When in Kingston last week I held, in company with brother Dexter, a private meeting with the natives of Africa on this interesting subject. Oh, that you had been there! To me it was most delightful. We had present Africans from many parts of Africa; William McCall, a papa from Cape Coast, a good man; John McCall, from Cape Mesurado, offered instantly to go, and appeared to long for the time. When I asked him when he would be ready, "To-morrow," was his energetic reply: "I can wait off, but I feel for my poor countrymen; I long, I have longed for years, to tell them of Jesus; nothing but the blood of Jesus will stop the accursed slave-trade!" Hear this, Christians, from the lips of an African.

Among the interesting scenes that this meeting presented, I must mention the following. W. Walker, a soldier, a black man, announced himself as King Hill. His history is this:—He says that his father is the present King, whom most of the slaves are sold, and the father is a very great slave-dealer. Seventeen years ago his father sent him to Spain by one of the slave-ships, to learn to read and write; the vessel, which was full of slaves, was captured by the British; he enlisted, and is now in Her Majesty's service. He is a member of one of our churches, and longs to go back to tell his father to stop the slave-trade. The residence of King Hill is somewhere near Fernando Po, where Mr. Collins and Mr. Collins wish to go, and go they must.

Allow me to mention another incident. Mr. P.—'s servant, who is a Baptist, came bringing her son, and with deep feeling said, "Mr. Knibbe, ever since you have talked about Africa, my son has been urging me to let him go to be a schoolmaster there. All I can say is, that I dare not refuse. It is the land of his grandfather and grandmothers. If you choose, I give him up to the work."

I have had several incidents like this. Several of my old scholars are quite alive to the subject, and the general feeling among the people is delightful. It would rejoice your heart, I am sure, to see the ardent feeling displayed. Bear in mind that the Gospel first came to Jamaica by Africans or their descendants, and that now they are free they appear determined to be the first to carry it back to their native land; they may not be all we could wish, but they will be noble pioneers, as they were in Jamaica, and they ought to be sent in their native simplicity, and in their unbroken energy."—Fat.

EDUCATION.

THE LATE REV. RICHARD WATSON'S OF SECULAR AND RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.—"The new plan for general education in Ireland, proposed by Government, which endeavours to meet all religious parties, by making education secular, leaving one day in every week unoccupied, that the children may be taught religion by their own Pastors, or friends, has met with some severe criticisms from zealous Protestant Churchmen. For our parts, if there must be a general plan for national education in Ireland, we are not how else it can be conducted, than by rendering it wholly literary. The charge is certainly unfounded, that the plan is hostile to religious instruction; for, in fact, it recognizes its necessity by exempting the scholars one day in the week for this purpose. It is easy to object; but since the Catholics will not send their children to schools taught in the Protestant mode, though such schools should be set up throughout Ireland, the question is this, Whether it is better to leave the Catholic peasantry wholly without education, or grant it to them in this way. We prefer the latter; and, though the Government plan, in its details, is capable of improvement, and indeed lies open to revision and amendment, yet if honestly conducted, it will prove a great benefit. We are further inclined to think that too much dependance has been placed upon schools of every kind, as the instruments of directly conveying religious knowledge. The duty of the Minister and of the parent has been too much neglected in this respect; and that has been left to others which, the latter by nature, the former by office, are specially charged either to do, or to superintend."—Christ. Adv.

SCIENTIFIC.

DOVER, Thursday, June 13.—Yesterday, from daylight to sunset, a continuous flight of locusts of vast height and width passed through and over the town of Calais, taking the direction of the Low Countries. Several from two inches to three inches in length were secured, and have been presented by Captain Smithett, of the Ariel Post-office Packet, to the Dover Museum.—Fat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE COPIOUS RAINS which have fallen this week have imparted a delightful freshness to the earth, which in all directions presents a healthful, verdurous, and luxuriant aspect. If making will commence in about ten days. The wheat and other crops are recovering their impaired condition, and a prolific summer and bounteous autumn may not unreasonably be anticipated.—Bristol Journal.

A STEER TOWARDS TEMPERANCE.—The Lords of the Admiralty have issued orders prohibiting women and children who embarked on board any of her Majesty's ships or troop ships, the usual proportion of spirits; but in consideration thereof have granted them double allowance of tea, cocoa, and sugar.—Hampshire Telegraph.

VESSEL RUN DOWN BY A STRAMER.—On Monday an Inquest was held at the Ship Tavern, East Tilbury, Essex, before Charles Caine Lewis, Esq., Coroner, on the body of Marcus Buck, aged 34, who was drowned on the morning of the 10th of May, by the Gratitudine cutter, in which he and others were being run down by the Castor, French steam-ship, in the river below Gravesend. The evidence given by the people on board the cutter attributed the accident to negligence and the want of a proper look out that the poor man had lost his life. The statement given by the pilot in charge of the steam-ship was contrary. The Jury, after a short deliberation, returned a verdict of "Accidental Death," with a deduction of 50*l*. on the Castor steam-ship. The Gratitudine is a total wreck, and remains under water.—Fat.

VAUXHALL GARDENS will not be opened this season, in consequence of the losses upon the last two or three seasons.—Ibid.

THE ARMOURIES AT THE TOWER.—Before the reduction of the admission fee from 2*s*. to 1*s*. the number of visitors who paid entrance was about 10,000 annually; but during the following year it increased to nearly fourfold, or 40,000. Since the further reduction to 6*d*., the number of visitors is again greatly beyond that average. In May, 1838, the amount was 4,526; but in May, 1839, it was 9,454, producing a much larger profit than when the charge was four times the present fee.—Ibid.

THE SUGAR-DUTIES BILL was read on Friday, 28th June, a third time, and passed. Mr. Ewart moved a resolution, declaring that sugar produced by free labour ought to be introduced into this country, on payment of the same duties as those on Colonial sugar. Supported by Mr. Thornely, Mr. Fane, Mr. Clay, Mr. Hume, and Mr. Mark Phillips, but opposed by Mr. Spring Rice and Mr. Poulett Thomson. Mr. Ewart withdrew his motion. The speech of the President of the Board of Trade seemed to be altogether in favour of the motion; and he dwelt especially on the importance of preserving the trade with the Brazils.—Christ. Adv.

MOUSSELIN DE LAINE MANUFACTURE.—The mousseline de laine was first introduced into this country about three years ago, in a fabric composed wholly of wool, within the reach only of the wealthier classes. To meet, however, the demand for all ranks in society, a mixed fabric, consisting of cotton and wool was substituted, coarser wool being employed; and the sale having got into a great number of hands, the mousseline-de-laine may adorn the person of any one who can command the price of a common cloth. Formerly immense quantities were imported from France, on payment of a heavy duty, and when first introduced, sold at most exorbitant prices, but now the foreign goods have been met with such a severe competition from the British manufacturer, that they are nearly altogether driven out of the market. France has always had the reputation of producing the finest goods in the world, and had our Garlic neighbours not met with such powerful competitors in the British, they might, for a long time, and for the higher description of goods, command a complete monopoly in the market. At the same time the number of hands engaged in this trade is enormous. Besides those who are occupied at the printing table, a great proportion, nearly one-half of the hand-loom weavers of Scotaid, are in full operation in manufacturing the cloth; in almost all the smallest villages in the west there is scarcely a loom idle, and we are pretty safe in saying, that there is not a respectable dealer who will find any difficulty in obtaining employment from the innumerable de laine manufacturers. This trade has given a mighty impulse to the wool trade; but at the same time it has considerably weakened the hands of the cotton-spinners, who are complaining of the small demands for particular sorts of their yarn.—Christ. Adv.

BANK OF ENGLAND GRANT FOR CHURCH BUILDING.—We understand that the direction of the Bank of England has voted a sum of 500*l.* towards the building a new church in the eastern division of the metropolis. It is fortunate for the direction of the Bank of England that the proprietors are perfectly satisfied with their dividends without asking for an examination of accounts. Were it otherwise, we should suppose that the directors would find it difficult to satisfy the Quakers and other Dissenters, who constitute no inconsiderable portion of the body of proprietors, upon what principle the corporate funds are voted for any other than corporate objects.—Morning Chronicle.

UNITED STATES.—By the Great Western Steamer, which arrived at Bristol on Wednesday evening, after a passage of less than thirteen days, New York papers have been received to the 14th ult. The political news is unimportant. Business, especially in the cotton-market, was dull. Two slave-ships, belonging to Americans, had been captured by a British man-of-war, and taken to New York; where the offenders may be dealt with according to the laws of their own country.—Christ. Adv.

WEST INDIES.—The Governor of Demerara and Berbice has put an end to the session of his Parliament, with a rebuke to the members for their factious conduct.—Ibid.

ANTI-SLAVERY CONVENTION.—We mentioned in our last that the committee of the British and Foreign Anti-slavery Society had taken up with lively interest the idea of a general convention of friends to the cause of freedom from every nation. It appears that a very heavy co-operation may be expected from the abolitionists of the United States. It has been accordingly resolved to invite and prepare for such a general convention, its proceedings to commence in London on the 12th of June, 1840.—British Emancipator.

JAMAICA.—Extract of a Letter from J. M. Phillippo to Joseph Sturge, dated Spanish-Town, Jamaica, May 2, 1839.—“I am exceedingly concerned to find that the planters have succeeded in erecting a new slave code. They have made a desperate effort to do this, and they have succeeded. It is currently reported here that the London journalists, who have lately manifested so much sympathy with our late slave-masters, have been bought for that purpose; and they have certainly shown themselves, especially the professedly anti-aristocratical part of them, by no means inconvertible to bribes. Should the Government at all listen to the misrepresentations of the pro-slavery party, it will be a most lamentable circumstance, as it would but revive the difference of which they complain, and which are now almost universally set at rest. The most profound tranquillity universally prevails. Our courts of justice seldom now behold a criminal, and the absence of ordinary offences from the calendar is often the subject of gratulation by the Judge. The business of the estates and ports is almost in every instance being proceeded with; innumerable spots are being recovered by small settlers from the wastes. New villages are rapidly rising up in every direction. Land is nearly double the value it was a few months ago. Estates and small farms are seldom in the market, and when they are, although greatly augmented in value, there is no want of purchasers. The advantages resulting from the new state of things in the towns are too palpable to admit of a single question. The houses are being erected, or old ones are undergoing repairs in almost every street; the markets are abundantly supplied with provisions; the comforts and wants of civilised life are increasingly desired and possessed; merchants and traders have more employment than formerly; and intimations of the decrease of commerce, of the decline of agriculture, and of the ruin of the country, are nowhere to be seen. So far are we from being likely to realize the dismal predictions of the enemies of freedom, that the very reverse may be confidently expected. Not only is this fact proclaimed by the avidity with which properties are purchased when exposed for sale, by the increased price of land, together with the host of other evidence, but also by the efforts that are being made for the improvement of agriculture, by the designs in contemplation both for the maintenance and transport of troops in the more general interests of the country, and in the constructing of railroads, by the various public institutions which are beginning to rise into being, and by the conversations that are daily taking place to the advantage of the new-state of things among proprietors and attorneys themselves.

“The strongest evidence is offered by every thing we see and hear around us, that we enjoy the dawn of a brighter day in every respect than Jamaica has ever yet beheld.

“It is remonstrated here that Sir Lionel Smith is to be in his turn sacrificed by the Colonial Office to expediency. A most earnestly hope this is not the case; if so, there will again be confusion and every evil work.

Extract of a Letter from John Clark to Joseph Sturge, dated Brownstown, Jamaica, May the 2nd, 1839.

“The people are going on admirably. On almost every sugar estate in this part of the parish there is as much sugar making, I believe, as during the apprenticeship. I can mention O-ranney Valley (nearly all the people on which are connected with my church), Cave Valley, Boreburgh Bridge, and Greenock, where the people are employed by the job, or at 1*s.* 6*d.* per day, with houses and grounds. They are working well. At Danbarron, Antrim, Colloden, Ballyentry, although the people are not paid more than at the other places, they are charged from 2*s.* 4*d.* to 6*s.* 8*d.* per week rent; yet there is no real cause of complaint. They are also working well, although for less than their neighbours; but this I do not expect to continue. These estates must either pay the market-price for labour or lose their people, if land can be bought in the neighbourhood.

“There is one interesting fact which I cannot forbear mentioning, that from the time of Manlison's (the late Special Justice) removal to the end of the apprenticeship, but two persons connected as member or enquirers with my station were punished, and those improperly and unjustly.

“From the 1st of August to this date not one has been imprisoned for any crime, although nearly 3,000 in number; indeed, in the whole district with which, as a minister, I have to do, in which there is a negro population of nine or ten thousand, full half of which attend my ministry, but one black person has been committed to prison, and that for an assault which, I think, was compromised.

“We have no police, and we need none. Were it not for the disputes respecting wages and rents, the stipendiary magistrate would have a serene situation.

“I was very sanguine respecting the working of freedom. My expectations are more than realised. Give God the glory.”

NEWFOUNDLAND.—The Legislature are involved in a fresh quarrel with the Governor. In Prince Edward's Island, also, much discontent prevailed, of which many persons being ejected from Crown lands on which they had expended labour and money, without possessing a legal title to the property. The House of Representatives had deputed their Speaker, Mr. Cooper, to proceed to England, for the purpose of inducing the Government to take some measure respecting the Crown lands.—Christ. Adv.

THIRTY ABORIGINAL NATIVES OF NEW SOUTH WALES have been cruelly murdered in cold blood, by white settlers, seven of whom have been convicted of the massacre, and executed on the 15th of December. The details in the Sydney papers, just arrived, disclose frightful particulars.—Pat.

J. STUART, Lt. Col. Secy. to the Govt. of India, Milly. Dept.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE COMMANDER OF THE FORCE.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 23d August, 1859.

The following extract of a military letter, from the Honourable the Court of Directors to the Government of India, No. 21, dated the 11th April, 1859, is published to the army:

"Letter dated 26th Nov. 1858, (No. 89).
Submit the case of Major W. Gregory, who has been transferred to the invalid establishment, after reference to Government as to his right to the pension, to which his previous services entitled him at the period of his transfer. Government decided, subject to Court's confirmation, that his claim is not invalidated by his removal to the non-effective list; but in the event of the Court's deciding differently, Major Gregory may be allowed to retire on the pension of Lieutenant Colonel, to which he is entitled under the regulations.

Para. 25. We have no hesitation in expressing our opinion, that an officer who has completed the prescribed period of effective service, and who would be entitled to the benefit of the enlarged pension regulations, as published in General Orders, No. 203 of 1857, does not lose his right to the pension, if he is transferred to the invalid establishment, such title however must depend entirely on effective service; and that pensioned invalids, after transfer to the invalid establishment, can give no additional claim under the regulations above mentioned.

The Presidency Division order of the 7th instant, directing the undermentioned Cornet and Ensigns, recently admitted into the service, to do duty with the corps specified opposite their names, is confirmed:

Cornet D. Bayley, 26th Regt. M. L. Artillery, at Meerut.
Ensign E. R. Robertson, 26th Regt. M. L. Artillery, at Meerut.
C. B. Stuart, 26th ditto at Meerut.
H. R. Young, 26th ditto at Meerut.

The following individuals are appointed Hospital Apprentices, to com-the establishment to the number authorized by Government General Order No. 123, of 24th instant, and directed to report themselves, within two months from this date, to the nearest Superintending Surgeon:

Francis Joseph Murphy.
Thomas Huckle Warford.
Edward West.
Michael Carroll.
Edmund Peck.
Robert Frederick Thompson.
Charles Webb.
Michael Courtney.
George Hurd.

After these youths shall have served six months in any European hospital, special reports of their talents and acquirements are to be made to local quarters, by the Superintending Surgeon of the division in which they may be employed; and should it appear that any of them are not likely to become efficient subordinate medical attendants, such individuals as may be so considered, will either be discharged the service, or dispensed of as unfit, hereafter to be determined.

This is to be distinctly explained to the Apprentices, on their joining an hospital.

Quarter Master Sergeant Joseph Tiplon, of the 7th, is appointed Surgeon Major to the 234th regiment of native infantry, vice Macab dressed, and Sergeant Isaac Holt, of the 1st company 24th battalion of artillery, is transferred to the Town Major's list, and appointed Quarter Master Sergeant to the 7th regiment of native infantry, vice Tiplon.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 24th August, 1889.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 24th August, 1889.

At a general court martial, convened at Kurnool, on Thursday the 15th day of August 1889, Meer Kunnur Ali, Recruit, light company 34th regiment native infantry, was arraigned on the following charges:—
"Charge 1."—Id. i. l. Having deserted from his regiment, on the 4th of July 1889.

"2d." With having stolen, or made away with, a pair of shoes belonging to the property of Captain Burnett, commanding light company 34th regiment native infantry.

Finding—"The court, upon the evidence before it, finds the prisoner Meer Kunnur Ali, Recruit, of the light company 34th regiment native infantry, guilty of the first charge, guilty.

"On the second charge, not guilty, of which the court acquits him.

Sentence—"The court having found the prisoner Meer Kunnur Ali, Recruit, of the light company 34th regiment native infantry, guilty of the first charge, as above recorded, does sentence him to suffer an imprisonment for the period of two months."

(Signed) JOHN RAMSAY, Major General.

26th August, 1889.

The prisoner to be delivered over to the civil authorities at Paniput, for the purpose of undergoing his punishment; and his name will cease to be borne upon the rolls of the 34th regiment native infantry.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 26th August, 1889.

The Meerut division order of the 21st instant, appointing Veterinary Surgeon P. B. F. Green, of the 2d brigade of horse artillery, to the charge of the horses of Her Majesty's 16th Hussars, is confirmed.
Buck Rimmo Ali, having been pronounced qualified for the situation is appointed a Native Doctor, and directed to do duty with the 21st regiment of native infantry at Kurnool.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 26th August, 1889.

Lieutenant W. Jervis, of the 43d regiment of native infantry, will join and do duty with the recruit depot at Allahabad, until further orders.
By order of the Commander of the Forces,

J. R. LUMLEY, Major General, Assistant General of the Army.

GENERAL ORDER BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE COMMANDER IN CHIEF.

Head Quarters, Poonah, 26th August, 1889.

KN—His Excellency the Commander in Chief, in conformity with instructions received from the Right Honourable the Secretary at War, publishes the following extract for the information and guidance of officers Commanding Her Majesty's Regiments in India.

"With advantage to the Remittances which Spicers of Her Majesty's Troops serving in the East India Company are permitted to make to Europe, through the East India Company's Treasury, the sum to be remitted by a Soldier at any one time, is to be restricted to the amount of the actual saving of his pay, for a period not exceeding one year, upon his last Remittance.

This however, is not to interfere with the liberality of the Court of Directors of the East India Company, in regard to the property of Invalids being home.

The extension of leave of absence granted by the officer Commanding the Forces in Bengal, to Lieutenant Surgeon, Her Majesty's 21st Fusiliers, for one month from 1st to 21st July last, to enable him to join his Corps from Madras, is confirmed.

Head Quarters, Poonah, 16th August, 1889.

His Excellency the Commander in Chief has been pleased to make the following Promotions into Her Majesty's pleasure shall be known:—
1st Foot.—Ensign H. Pratt to be Lieutenant by purchase, vice Wallace, who retires, 16th August 1889.

27th Foot.—Assistant Surgeon Arthur Wood, M. D., from the 3d Light Dragoons, to be Surgeon, vice Hamilton, deceased, 23d June 1889.
His Excellency the Commander in Chief is pleased to grant an extension of the leave, on Medical Certificate, published in the General Orders of the 12th February 1888, to Lieutenant Lockyer, 27th Regiment, from the 3d September 1887 to the 2d February 1889, on the recommendation of several Medical Boards subsequently assembled.

The leave of absence granted by the officer Commanding the Forces in Bengal, to Lieutenant Norman, 3d Light Dragoons, to proceed to England, on Medical Certificate, is confirmed.

By order of the Commander in Chief.

R. TORRENS, Major General, Adj. Genl. H. M. Forces in India.

THE MAIL.—Unfortunately for us, the last Mail arrived just after our last paper had been sent to press, and whatever notice we may give of its contents, must now appear to be a week behind the fair. It is some consolation, therefore, that this is the most barren Mail which has reached India, since the establishment of steam communication; that it contains nothing, literally nothing; not a battle, military or naval; not a royal birth, marriage, death or coronation. But with all this apparent absence of any news of striking importance, it has brought a vast deal of information, which cannot fail to interest those who watch the indications of public good, and delight in following causes out to the gradual development of their effects. And first we have a more distinct announcement than we have yet received, that the Court of Directors will do nothing to give Madras, Calcutta, Ceylon and the East, the benefits of steam navigation. To the proposals which have been reiterated by Her Majesty's Ministers, they persist in giving a deaf ear; and our path of duty is thus rendered more plain than ever, 'to put our own shoulders to the wheel, and get up a precursor steamer.'—Then we have accounts from the West Indies, regarding the treatment of the Coolies, who were sent to Demerara, which will go far to settle the question of the Cooly Trade for ever. Both on the voyage, and after their arrival there, they experienced treatment, and were subjected to distress, which it is impossible to hear of without indignation. With this evidence before them, neither Houses of Parliament will venture to pass an Act for the revival of the trade, even though the report of the Calcutta Cooly Committee should never be sent home.—The Chartist combination, which originated in want of bread, and which is now perpetuated with the view of changing the institutions of the country, so as to bring down the ancient landlord and the gentleman manufacturer to the same level of poverty with the peasant and the mechanic, appears to possess a wider ramification, and a more formidable organization, than was at first suspected. To keep down this general spirit of insurrection, the Police of Birmingham has been remodelled under an Act of Parliament, and an addition of five thousand men has been made by the standing army; but what is of far more interest, Ireland is found to have been so far pacified by the administration of Lord Normandy and Fortescue, that she can spare troops to keep down revolutionary movements in England! This almost incredible fact is the most triumphant answer which could be given to the one thousand four hundred pages of evidence which the Lords have got up, to prove that their administration has been the worst with which Ireland has ever been scourged.—The foundation has been laid for one of the greatest changes, which, even in this age of change, England has experienced. The Penny Postage Act has passed, and a letter will now go from Johnny Groat's House to the Land's End, for half an anna. It is impossible to foresee the result of this matchless facility of correspondence on the social habits and character of the people; though it is easy to perceive that this reform, combined with the unprecedented facilities of locomotion, must produce the most powerful effects on the national character and feeling.—In Egypt and Turkey the plot thickens. To Constantinople are the eyes of all Europe turned with feelings of intense anxiety; and within a month from the date of our latest accounts, it would appear as though the question of a European war with England and Russia, as principals, and all the other powers, as associates, must be decided. England and France insist on the restoration of the stolen fleet; and the old Pasha strenuously refuses their demands, and prepares for a stout resistance; and, for ought we know, in the same locality where, forty years ago, the English and French fleets met in deadly hostility, there the English and French fleets may, by a combined movement, have attacked and annihilated the entire naval power of the Mahomedan world, collected into one port by a movement which appears altogether mysterious. How the crescent wanes! How is the source of Mahomedan power dried up by event after event! Russia lays Persia prostrate at her feet. France subjugates Algiers, and Mahomedan authority along the southern shore of the Mediterranean is extinct. England marches into Afghanistan, fixes a British army at Cabul, and make British influence predominant throughout Western Asia. And now the last remaining Mahomedan powers, the Sultan of Constantinople and the Pasha of Egypt, involved in the web of European politics, are brought into a state in which it remains for Christian nations to declare whether their Government shall be upheld, or cease for ever. The whole course of political movements for the last twenty years appears as though it had been directed by one uniform principle, that of delivering the world from Mahomedan influence.

Messrs. THACKER and CO.'S ADVERTISEMENT.—In calling attention to the Advertisement of Messrs. Thacker and Co., which will be found in its proper place, we do not pretend to entire freedom from personal feeling. Long and deep-rooted friendship would secure our interest in any thing that concerned the prosperity of St. Andrew's Library. But on the present occasion there is no need of calling upon private affection for a stimulus. Messrs. Thacker and Co. have taken a bold step, which claims attention for its harmony with the spirit of the age, and its important bearing upon the intellectual improvement of the country. They have determined to adopt the English system of small profits on large transactions, instead of the old fashioned one of little business and exorbitant gains. We have no doubt the change will, in the end, be equally beneficial to themselves and to the public. Nevertheless, it must have required considerable courage to adopt it; and the resolution deserves a proportionate reward. In former times, when the reading public was of very limited extent, no system of book-selling could have been successful, but that which existed. But every year witnesses a large increase of our European residents; and the East Indian population, are rapidly multiplying, and rising in their intellectual character, at the same time. Whilst the English education of schools of the metropolitan Native youth is contemporaneously creating an additional demand for English books, to which no limit can be assigned. In such circumstances a new system is required; and we are happy to witness its introduction. It will be observed that Messrs. Thacker and Co. have determined to reduce the priests of the whole of their present large and varied stock to the new standard. We can bear testimony to its containing many prizes worth looking after. But the great recommendation of the measure is the facility it gives every gentleman, in obtaining whatever book he chooses from England. The advertisements in the English Periodicals will keep any one acquainted with whatever is published, or will soon be published, in every department of literature, and the price of every book. By them we can choose for ourselves, instead of trusting to the choice of an English Agent, whose rule of selection is generally taken from his business connections; and then, on forwarding the necessary remittance, which we can calculate for ourselves, to Messrs. Thacker and Co., we shall have our books out in a few months, without risk or trouble. What with the Overland Mails, and fast-sailing ships, the execution of such orders has been brought into a very brief period indeed. We have ourselves had an order executed this year, through St. Andrew's Library, some days within the six months.

The improvement we may expect from the new arrangement, in the furnishing of schools with the best books of education, is of vast importance; and we shall take an opportunity now and then of mentioning such works, as from experience, we can recommend to our friends engaged in the superintendence of schools. The English Publishers may now find it for their interest, too, to send out their advertisements, especially of works connected with, or adapted to India, for publication in this country.

BRITISH INDIA SOCIETY.—The establishment of a Society in England, by men of leading importance, for the express purpose of diffusing correct information, relative to the British Empire in the East, is an event which no benevolent mind can contemplate without pleasure. The sympathy with which the condition and the welfare of ninety millions of people has been treated by the nation, to which they were subject, has been as disgraceful to our national character, as it has been disastrous to India. But better times are, we trust, before us. Those who have been instrumental in delivering England from the plague-spot of slavery, have now turned their attention to the East; and they have begun at the right end, with the people of England. Nothing but the energy of the popular voice will induce Parliament to look into the affairs of India, which had been quietly consigned to the corporation of Londonhall Street, in the hope that there would be no necessity for again reverting to them, till the year of our Lord, 1854. All great reforms, in reference both to our domestic and colonial economy, have originated with the constituency, and through them have been forced on the attention of the Representatives. And the case of India, so far from forming an exception, is one which demands, in a peculiar degree, the advocacy of the people, to overcome the particular indisposition of Parliament to its affairs. And it is only as its condition can be brought under the frequent consideration of Parliament, that the Directors can be expected to execute, with zeal and fidelity, the trust reposed in them. All corporations are disposed to slumber, in proportion as they are relieved from the observation of those who can controul them.

We rejoice that the affairs of India have been taken up by men of such powerful ability, as those who have taken the lead in the British India Society; and more especially, that the benevolent sympathies and watchless eloquence of George Thompson have been enlisted in its service. It is impossible to read his speeches, without feeling satisfied that his advocacy of this cause arises from the purest impulse of philanthropy. If he errs, it is from want of information, not from having adopted party or factious views. And it is on this account that we the more regret those inaccuracies which are to be found in his addresses. Those who are indifferent to the welfare of India, will rejoice at the exaggerated tone of his remarks, and represent him as a demagogue, who combines ignorance with party zeal; who denounces a Government, with whose real character he is unacquainted; and advocates the cause of a country, of whose actual condition he knows little. There is nothing which will give such efficacy to his denunciations as the truth; nothing which can neutralize the benefit of his exertions, but the admixture of a large alloy of misinformation. So thoroughly are we convinced of the perfect honesty of his views, and the manliness of his character, that we are satisfied that any observations from those on the spot, who enjoy facilities for detecting error, either in his data or his conclusions, will be received with feelings of approbation. Mr. Thompson has far too great a mind to be capable of humbug, as one of our correspondents has suggested.

The great object of the Society is to rouse the best feelings of the people of England in favour of the Natives of India, and to lay the foundation of reform, by the diffusion of correct information regarding its condition. But if the facts which have been stated in the various speeches which we now before us, is to be taken as a sample of the information with which the people of England are to be furnished respecting India, it would be more benevolent to let the delusion, inasmuch as ignorance is better than error, and the notion which inevitably follows exaggeration, will do more detrimental to our interests, than the apathy with which they were viewed. It is with no little pain we have remarked, that the statements which have been put forth by some of the members of the Society, are so distorted, as to throw discredit upon all its operations, and to weaken, if not altogether destroy, the prospect of its utility. When, for instance, can be more fallacious than to ascribe the late famine in the Western Provinces to the Government, which did every thing to mitigate its horrors? Every man of right feeling must instantly have perceived, that to attribute a visitation of Providence to human agency; to charge the Government of this country with having deliberately and diabolically brought nine successive famines on this unhappy country, as a return for the revenues which it had been yielding, was too revolting to be true. "Governments are not monsters, though they be men. When the preposterous character of this charge was found to be a complete answer to it, the ground was shifted, and the miseries of the famine were ascribed to the want of roads, which prevented one province from pouring its redundant produce into those which were afflicted with want. But even this mitigated charge falls to the ground. The famine raged in a part of the country where the great highways are of Nature's own formation; and the greatest mortality prevailed on the streams which are the great channels of commerce. If, in addition to these natural roads, the country had been intersected with railroads, and grain could have been transported at the rate of thirty miles an hour, how would the severity of this calamity have been mitigated? It was money that was wanting to buy grain. The peasantry always living from hand to mouth, were reduced to the last stage of poverty. They had no funds to purchase grain at any rate, much less at the exorbitant prices then asked; and no facility of communication would have induced the merchants to take the grain to a local market. The Englishman has well and succinctly described the cause of the famine in these clear expressions.

"Mr. O'Connell clearly does not know that the starvation in India, as in Ireland, arises from two causes: first the failure of the crops; and next, the extreme and utter poverty of the people, wholly disabling them from purchasing food, which, though dear, was to be had in most markets; and would have been carried to all, if any hope of sale existed."

But the famine was occasioned by poverty; the poverty was brought on by the over-taxation of Government; and Government is still guilty of the famine. On this train of reasoning, Government may become responsible for all the disorders and crimes which arise from poverty; and where will its responsibility end? But if India is over-taxed, by whose command, and for whose benefit is it done? For that of England. Of the eighteen millions sterling of revenue raised in India, one-sixth, or three millions sterling, is sent home annually by the Government to England. Of the tribute of which this unhappy country is thus drained, that which bears the clearest stamp of injustice, and which suggests to the mind of the people the most vivid idea of grinding oppression, which forms the iron that enters the soul, is the payment made to the Proprietors of East India Stock. For Lord Brougham's new-born sympathies towards the suffering millions of India, we trust that becoming gratitude will be felt; but we cannot banish from our recollection, that it was the Cabinet, the Whig Cabinet, in which Lord Brougham held one of the most distinguished posts, which saddled this country with this most iniquitous expense, which, in addition to every other charge, condemned India to indemnify the Proprietors of East India Stock, for the loss of their China trade, which had been professedly carried on with their commercial capital, and with which India had no other connection, than the identity of those merchants with its rulers. Before Lord Brougham reproaches the Government of India with having done little for the improvement of India, let him restore us the sinews of improvement, of which he assisted in depleting this country. Give us back the 650,000*l.* a year; reduce the annual drain on our revenues; of the three millions that are now sent home annually, restore us one million, and if needs can prevent famine, there shall be no scarcity; if funds can bestow knowledge, there shall be no ignorance; if the expenditure of the revenues of the country in the country itself, can procure comfort, there shall be no distress. It is idle to talk about justice to India, while by Act of Parliament, Fifty Millions Sterling are to be sent to England of the revenues of India, during the currency of the present Charter. To take away the means of improvement, and then to reproach us with our barbarism, is a mockery unworthy of generous minds. Try the experiment in England. In addition to the taxes now raised, let England tax herself six millions more, and send it out to us annually, without any hope of a return, and it would soon appear how, with all her wealth and boundless resources, this drain would be felt to affect even her welfare and improvement.

There is nothing, however, in the general amount of taxation, considered in reference to the number of tax-payers, which would bear out the charge of oppression. A population of nine millions pay a hundred and eighty millions of Rupees to the State. Taxation falls, therefore, at the rate of about four shillings a head by the year, or fourpence by the month. If this impost was equally distributed, and if it formed the only burden on the people, they would not feel its weight. But it is unequally divided. It is raised almost exclusively from the agricultural population; but large bodies of men who have surreptitiously obtained possession of land, called free, bear no part of the public burdens, and the weight of taxation, therefore, presses more heavily on those who contribute to the wants of the State. Then, again, the peasantry are heavily taxed by their Landlords, beyond the established rent of lands; they are taxed grievously by the abominable system of sub-letting, by which the landlord is relieved from the vexatious incident to the collection of rents, while the agriculturist is obliged to support three or four middlemen, one above the other, whose accumulated weight presses him to the ground; they are fleeced by the servants of the landlord, by the Native Officers of Government, and by rapacious priesthood. Hence they have no reserve funds even for a twelve-month. They are invariably behind hand; and this renders them a prey to the money lenders, who drain them of their very life blood; and the peasant of one of the most fertile countries in the world, is found to be in the most wretched condition to which man can be reduced; fed with one meal a day, and that of the coarsest food; covered with a rag round his loins; surrounded by a litter of naked children, and all jiggling together in a miserable hovel, scarcely fit for a beast. But beyond this general idea of the state of the country, we know nothing. After having held Bengal for more than eighty years, we are ignorant of the condition of the peasantry who live within twenty miles of the metropolis.

We have already exceeded the limits of a single article, and must, therefore, reserve to a future occasion whatever remarks we may offer on the speeches and proceedings of a Society, which will, we trust, prove a blessing to this country.

CHINA.—Through Bombay we have been furnished, within the last week, with intelligence regarding Chinese affairs, both from England and from China itself; our latest direct intelligence from whence, was nearly four months old. The Humber Castle has brought news to the 17th of July. It is as little satisfactory as that which preceded it. No explanations had taken place between the English and the Chinese authorities, and the prospect of a restoration of the trade was very remote. A large fleet of merchantmen was anchored off Macao, many of them laden with cargoes, which the suspension of commercial intercourse prevented their landing. Several of these vessels had been equipped, as men of war, to repel any attack which the Chinese might make. The Viceroy still continued to insist on the signing of Opium bonds by all Captains; but the mercantile community had firmly resisted a measure which must have placed them under the arbitrary power of Chinese tribunals, and left them at the mercy of any one who chose to fabricate informations against them. It appears, however, that the American Captains, anxious to profit by the existing state of things,* continued to reside at Canton, and had affixed their signature to the bonds, and that some of the English merchants had determined to carry on their trade in tea through this foreign agency.

The intelligence of the present crisis in China reached England about the close of July, and produced a lively sensation in the mercantile community. Our own private letters speak of the dismay which this disastrous information had excited. A deputation of merchants waited on the Ministry, to ascertain their intentions; but as Captain Elliot's public despatches by the Arct had not arrived, they could say nothing definite. The price of tea had begun rapidly to rise. When the continued suspension of the trade comes to be known, it is likely to be still farther augmented to such an extent, as to put this necessity of life beyond the reach of a large portion of the community. It is stated in the papers before us, that the importation of tea during the last two years, had fallen short of the consumption by nearly seven millions of pounds, and that the stock in hand on the 1st of August did not exceed fifty-four millions of pounds. As the means of remittance to China, through the medium of Opium was now closed, a great demand was suddenly created for dollars, which had risen to a considerable premium. The prospects of the tea trade and of the revenue, which it yields to Government, to the extent of more than three millions, were extremely gloomy. The season for the exportation of tea is rapidly approaching; yet the decision of the Home Authorities, on which the re-opening of the trade at Canton depends, can scarcely be expected to reach China before the beginning of January, even if they are enabled to come to a resolution upon this knotty subject, within a fortnight after the arrival of the despatches sent by the Arch. There seems every probability, therefore, if not an absolute certainty, that the large revenues involved in the tea trade will be interrupted possibly for a twelvemonth, and the Exchequer thrown into no small embarrassment.

Of any compensation to the Opium smugglers, there appears to be but faint hopes. All the papers speak with doubt and uncertainty on the subject; not one of them ventures to hold out any tangible expectations. The demand for compensation could scarcely have arrived at a more disastrous juncture. The disordered state of the money market had just obliged the Bank to resort to the disgraceful expedient of borrowing two millions of money in France. The aspect of affairs in the East of Europe was lowering, and the question of a general European war, in which England must take the lead, appeared to hang by a thread. At home the progress of the Charists had called for an augmentation of the standing army, and an increase of the public burdens. To crown the catalogue of embarrassments, the Ministry would now have before them the prospect of an interruption of the tea duty for an indefinite period. In these circumstances they cannot, they will not acknowledge the indemnification, without taking the sense of the House of Commons; and it is easy to foresee that in so popular an assembly, the unequivocal dictates of national interest will carry more weight than any equivocal question of national honour.

By what means Her Majesty's Ministers will propose to restore our commercial intercourse in China, it is utterly impossible to foresee. If the plan of unconditional submission be adopted, Chinese arrogance will reach its climax, and render the future commerce of the two countries more precarious than ever. If an armed force be employed to bring the Chinese to reason, England must consent to forego her tea for two years, and some other ways and means must be devised to fill up the void created by the loss of seven millions of revenue.

THE WISLEYAN METHODISTS.—It is with very great pleasure we give insertion to the letter of the Rev. Mr. Cryer, which will be found amongst our correspondence. We desire to do so in such a spirit, as to retain the good opinion and kindly sentiments both of Mr. Cryer and his brethren. To find fault, with satisfaction either to ourselves or to those we blame, is next to impossible. The mens cœlestis recti may carry with confidence of perfect integrity in motive and aim; but happy is he who has not reason to condemn himself, for the manner in which he does that, which he knows it to be his duty to do. It is a happiness, to a large measure of which we can lay no claim: although, in the matter of the Wesleyan Centenary, we see no reason to modify, in any essential degree, what we have before said.

As to those who are the subjects of censure, it may be questioned whether any of them has ever yet been satisfied—whether he was struck high or low. And it would be extremely unreasonable to take offence at the very faces, and the rather passionate, or perhaps bitter, exclamations, with which they testify the acuteness of their suffering. When, therefore, our Methodist friends at Madras showed so much soreness at our remarks on the proceedings of the body at home, we thought it all natural; and as we had nothing to retract or explain away by which we could hope to allay their irritation, we thought it best to leave them to the soothing influence of time and consideration. Our hope was, that our observations would do good in the end; and that the afflictions of our worthy friends would come back to us, if not from a sense of the good our severity had done them, yet because we knew they would find us still ready to chastise them, and all other devoted Christians, in every good work. We have now reason to be satisfied with the course we took.

The Methodists at Madras have had their Centenary meetings and subscriptions; and amongst our Contemporary Selections will be found a notice of them by a member of a different denomination, who bears testimony to the Christian-like spirit and deportment of those who took part in the business. It appears that whilst this reporter was observing the scene before him, he was led all through to a sort of involuntary comparison between what he saw, and the accounts of the Friend of India; and we suppose it is not unfair to imagine, that he was not the only person whose thoughts were haunted by this naughty Journal. Would it be unreasonable to think, that, when the Friend of India had placed before the conductors of that meeting, a reprehensible course, which must either be followed or avoided, they had gone to the meeting determined, that were the censuring Friend himself present, even he should be unable to find a fault to lay hold of. We think so well of them as to believe, that they were none the worse—that they were at least a little the better—for our faithfulness, unacceptable as it may at first have been. All the holy gratitude and devotion which they manifested was, through the grace of God, their own; but we cannot but think they are indebted to us, in some small measure, for their remarkable freedom from admixture of levity and vanity.

Our excellent Correspondent, were the matter fairly examined, would appear to be very much of the same mind with ourselves on the most important points. He declines any defence of the proceedings at the meeting which we noticed, in exemplification of what we had to blame. * But he objects to our taking any one meeting as a rule by which to judge of the whole series. Now we protest, that we had before us the proceedings of a number of meetings, and that the one we selected was a favourable, and not an unfavourable specimen; and the chief reason of our selecting it was, that as it was held at the very head quarters of Methodism, and in the face of metropolitan society, and was conducted by the first men of the body, both in office and reputation, there was every reason to conclude it would exhibit the very best phase a meeting of the kind could have. Our opinion is still the same. Our Correspondent also objects to the aberrations from the line of strict propriety, by which heated men stirred up by generous example, being tried by the cool judgement of the editorial study. We are glad our study should have the reputation of coolness, and would be the last to question the accuracy of our Correspondent's characterizing it. But if it be cool and calm, it must certainly be the very best place for coming to a right judgement: and if such things as public meetings and their excitements, good and bad, are not to be subjected to the examination of time and place so favourable, we cannot imagine why there should be any study, or reflection and judgement at all. But lastly it is thought, that if evil were done in a few things and instances, still the error should be pointed out in the spirit of brotherly kindness, rather than held up to obloquy and contempt. In that we completely agree with our Correspondent. To feel and to express a spirit of brotherly kindness to every true-hearted Christian is our constant desire and aim; and to hold any such up to obloquy and contempt is our abhorrence. For any inconsistency in our writings, with this rule, we are sincerely sorry. We hope he and his colleagues will believe us when we assure them, we have no feeling but brotherly kindness towards them.

Although the Wesleyans, the more the pity, have no Mission in Bengal, our censure of what we considered unwise in their Centenary assemblies was far from being out of place. They are not alone in the transgressions we have blamed; and there is too much danger in Calcutta of the imitation of what is bad, to leave us at liberty to pass by unnoticed the examples at home, which might be taken for precedents of evil here. From our native land we must draw both warning and guidance; and therefore all that passes there is fit subject of report and comment here.

We like exceedingly the hearty tone of our Correspondent's attachment to the religious body with which he is connected. He has seen great good—he has experienced great good in the convention; and he speaks accordingly. Yet he will allow us to differ from him in our opinion of the constitution of the Wesleyan Church. To our view it is all anomalous. The Wesleyans declare, if we understand the matter aright, their belief in the scriptural authority of Episcopal rule and ordination, and yet adopt for themselves a sort of pseudo-Presbyterianism, and still speak of their scriptural discipline: they defend the right and duty of the State to choose a form of religion for the people, and acknowledge that form which in England has been so chosen to be scriptural, and yet they yield obedience neither to Church nor State in respect of religion. These things we cannot reconcile; but we know our Methodist Brethren tell us, that what is inexplicable to us, is perfectly clear and consistent to them. And as it is their matter, and not ours, we are perfectly content to leave them in the enjoyment of their own opinion.

But there are important points in which we are ready to give praise to the Wesleyan denomination, even to the heart's content of our Correspondent. He says justly, that giving is not a lesson they have now to learn. It is true there is a wealth in their giving which has brought some discredit on it; and in consequence, there are those who have been ready to charge the Methodists with going far to substitute punctuality or liberality in pecuniary contribution, for more spiritual aspirations and evidence of personal piety in their members. In a measure it may be so. Yet other denominations of Christians have really no occasion for self complacency in their difference in this matter. They have gone much farther astray in religious piousness and covetousness, that is, in a profession of religion vitiated by the sin and idolatry of covetousness, than the Methodists have done in the piety of giving. In their readiness to give they are worthy of general imitation. Yet we scruple to say, as our Correspondent would prompt us, to the Baptist Churches in Calcutta or elsewhere: "Go and do likewise." We would rather have them do it much otherwise. We wish the giving, under the excitement of a public proclamation of the gift, were wholly driven from all Christian denominations. It is both unwisely and perilous: and who can reconcile it with the modesty, the privacy of goodness enjoined by our blessed Lord?

We must likewise commend the Methodists for having made the propagation of the gospel the work of the Church.

They have reaped much benefit from so doing. We believe their mission funds exceed those of any other missionary body; and they are collected with less trouble and evil influence perhaps than those of any others. Their Missions, too, derive great efficiency from the unity, and principle of abstinence which spread through them all. The ministry of the Wesleyan preachers has been long remarkably effective. We wish it may continue so; but we are not without our fears that they are losing force, by seeking refinement, as others have done before them. We have been led to think, on the other hand, that the congregational ministers, as a body, are now happily pursuing the opposite course, towards that just medium which is equally distant from illiterate vulgarity, and elegant, pointless fluency in their ministrations.

WEEKLY EPIITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 10.

The Overland Mail of August, with intelligence to the 12th, reached Calcutta at half-past three o'clock this morning, just eighteen days after the Mail had reached Bombay. The Englehurst availed himself of the arrangement which he had made regarding the distribution of the Mail, immediately on their arrival, and was enabled to give his readers a portion of the intelligence at day-break. The other papers were a few hours later. The next Mail was to leave London by the 18th of September.—On the afternoon of Tuesday last, the Bishop of Calcutta laid the foundation stone of the Cathedral. St. Paul's, Calcutta, amidst a very large concourse of European gentlemen. The entire expense of the edifice will be about six lakhs of Rupees, of which His Lordship expects about two lakhs of Rupees from England. The designs and plans are drawn by Major Forbes, of the Engineers, and the Cathedral will be erected under the superintendence of Col. Melcast, and Captain Fitzgerald, of the same corps.—It is now stated in the Western papers, that Lord Auckland will, in all probability, be at Agra in January, and remain a month or a fortnight.—The report, regarding the discovery of thirty-two copies of Rupees at Bampur, is now stated to be authentic, and it is added that a reference has been made by Lord Auckland to the home authorities, respecting the distribution of it.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 11.

The disappointment which the community in Calcutta had felt by the departure of the Hermes, without their Mails, and by the detention of the present Mail on the road, has been heightened, in no small degree, by an announcement just put forth that the Bombay Government intended to despatch the next Steamer to Suva on the 28th of this present month, thus allowing the merchants of Calcutta barely one day to reply to their letters. The chances are that a Mail, if heavily laden, sent away on this day, will not reach Bombay before the day fixed for the departure of the vessel. Mr. Robertson, however, has very consistently directed, that the Steamer should not leave Bombay till the arrival of the Calcutta Mails of the 12th, Saturday.—The papers of this day are necessarily so occupied with the European intelligence just arrived, as to have no room to spare for local affairs; and the only item of interesting intelligence we can meet with, is the fact, that the new vessel, the Paragon, laden 371 tons, was yesterday knocked down by Messrs. Mackenzie, Lyall and Co., for the sum of sixty thousand Rupees.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12.

This is the first day of the Holidays, which will this year extend to next Wednesday week, and afford the disappointed denizens of Calcutta thirteen full days for breathing the purer air of the river or the country. Calcutta is out of town; nobody left but the druggists and editorial drudges.—A deputation of some thirty gentlemen, the elite of the Civil Service, the Bar, the Merchants, and the Native gentry, waited on Mr. Robertson, headed by the Sheriff, with the Steam Petition, and were received by the Deputy Governor most graciously, and obtained a promise that the object of the deputation should receive his most cordial support.—The rumours published some time ago, regarding the increase in the manufacture of Salt in the 21st regiments, is confirmed by this day's papers. The investment of the year is to be increased from three lakhs of mounds to eight.—The papers state that the Rev. Mr. Yates has resigned the Pastorship of the Church in Circular Road, that he may devote his time, without reserve, to the Translation of the Scriptures. He is succeeded by the Rev. Mr. Tacker, who recently arrived in India in the Phaenix.—The Scoutinwa, which cost the Court of Directors two lakhs and eighty thousand Rupees, not three years ago, has finished her brief career of steaming, and is to be moored at Aden as a coal depot.—Entertainments have been given, both by the Governors of Bombay and of Madras, to celebrate the capture of Glizini; but none has been given in the metropolis of British India.—The Church which has long existed on the Missionary premises at Mirzapore, in Calcutta, has just been consecrated by the Bishop, under the title of Trinity Church.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 14.

By the arrival of the Bombay Castle, at Bombay, intelligence has been received from China to the 16th of July. We have alluded to it more particularly in an editorial article. The general gloom which hangs over commercial prospects in China, is somewhat relieved by an amusing letter from the Commissioner Liu, to the Queen of England, couched in the language usually addressed by the Chinese authorities, to an equal and an inferior, and beginning in the usual pompous moral style of Chinese documents:—"It appears that in the Great Reason of Heaven there is nothing selfish," and ending with an exhortation to our young Queen not to make use of falsehood or evasion! Her Majesty's new correspondents in the Celestial Empire wind up with saying, that they "most anxiously stand on tiptoe, waiting her reply."—Letters from the Punjab hold out a prospect of hostilities in that country, now that the master spirit is removed. Now Nihal Singh, the grandson of Runjeet Singh, who has an army at his disposal, is determined to put down the power of Dheean Singh, the Prime Minister, and both parties are preparing for the event.—Mam Singh has not submitted, according to the latest accounts. When the troops were ready to march into the fort, the very men who had invited us to this expedition, refused to allow the fort to be delivered up; and there is a possibility that the Chief may shew fight at the eleventh hour. The latest accounts are to the 25th of September.—The next Overland Mail is expected to reach Bombay with English news of the 16th September, on the 22d of October; and as a vessel will start for Suva from Bombay two or three days after that date, it is expected that under the new arrangements made in the Mediterranean, the London merchants will receive replies to their letters of the 16th September, in two months and twenty-four days.—The last Mails which were eighteen days in passing between Bombay and Calcutta, reached Madras in seven days.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 15.

A large fleet of vessels of war, consisting of H. M. Ships, the Wellfleet, with the Flag of the Admiral, the Lerne, the Faustina, and Algerine, has anchored in Madras, and is taking in provisions for a long voyage. Their destination is unknown. It can scarcely be China.—A Correspondent of the Englishman, who has resided at Hazareebag, in Bengal, where H. M. 9th Foot is quartered, gives a very interesting description of the climate. During the hottest month of the year, at the hottest period of the day, the thermometer in the shade never rose higher than 82; while at the same time the mercury in Calcutta was up at 94 and 96.—Letters have been received from Major Todd, who has arrived safely at Herat. The Shah Kauran has agreed to the treaty, by which the Governor General engages to indemnify him for the loss he sustained by the Persian invasion, and to repair the fortifications of Herat. On his part, he engages to hold no intercourse with any Prince to the West and to acknowledge Shah Soojah as the King of Cabul. Those who have been so loud in their praises of Capt. Pottinger, in England, for his gallant defence of Herat, for which he was appointed Envoy at the Court of Kanran, will regret to learn that he has experienced that ingratitude, which in all ages and all climates, and among all nations, has followed the footsteps of merit; he has been superseded, it is said, by base intrigue.—Private letters from Moulmein state, that Tharavaddie, following the example of the Pasha of Egypt, has begun to monopolize the trade of his own country, with the view of filling his coffers.—Sir Jasper Nicholls, who has been appointed Command-in-Chief of India, will, it is said, embark at Madras on the Golconda, without delay, and proceed to Calcutta.

PRECIS OF EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

The August Mail, with intelligence to the 12th of that month, reached Calcutta this day week, and disappointed the expectations of those who were looking out for a full budget of expectations. The members of the House of Commons had begun rapidly to disperse; and the House of Lords was overwhelmed with business sent up in shuals, for consideration, on the last three weeks of the Session. The prorogation was expected to take place about the 23th of August.

The formidable organization of the Chartists, had obliged Government to increase the standing army by 5000 men. Three of the revolutionists had been capitally convicted, and it was supposed the Ministry would allow the law to take its course.

The Jamaica Bill, though mutilated in the Lords, had passed the House of Commons, Lord John Russell having declared his intention to take such a bill as he could obtain.

The municipal qualification in Ireland has been raised by the Lords, at the suggestion of Lord Lyndhurst, from 5 to 1000.

The Penny Post Bill had passed, to the great joy of the nation. The Bank had raised discounts to six per cent., and borrowed two millions sterling in France.

There was a report in London, on the 12th August, that Don Carlos had been delivered up by one of his own Generals to the Queen of Spain.

In the debate in the House of Lords on the Government Education measure on the 3th July, the Bishop of Norwich, in defending a system of education in which religious instruction was divided into general and special, observed:—"It was said, where had they found it? He could give an answer to that; and a most satisfactory one. Who was the individual who had adopted that division? It was none other than a right rev. prelate, whose name would command their respect and esteem, he meant that evangelical prelate, Daniel Wilson, Lord Bishop of Exeter. Now, what had he done? There was established in India one of the first institutions in the world, called La Mission. A person of the name of Martin went abroad many years ago as a private scholar; he was promoted to the rank of Major General, and made a large fortune, which he left for the education of persons without any reference to creed, in the principles of general education. He had in his hand a document shewing that last night he had carried into effect. It was signed by Daniel Calcutta, Esq., of St. Ledger, and James Charles. He wished he could reverse the order there, and, instead of James Charles, put Daniel Calcutta at the top." The Bishop's joke excited the laughter of the House. Our readers may be aware it was a play upon the Bishop of London's name, and that of our excellent presbyterian Minister of St. Andrew's Church.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd does not mean to press his Copy-right Bill this session.

On the 30th July, Lord Wharfedale presented a petition from the Socialists of Sheffield, praying the House to appoint a Committee to examine Robert Owen with regard to the improvements proposed by him in the social system.

Mr. Ewart has given notice in the House of Commons, that early next session he will move for a Select Committee to inquire into the state of our commerce with the coast of Africa. The measure, we imagine, connected with Mr. Buxton's plan of crushing the slave trade by the activity of legitimate commerce.

Sir J. Hobhouse, in reply to a question respecting slavery in the East Indies, stated, on the 7th August in the House of Commons, that a commission was now sitting in India, on the subject of slavery in that country. We are sorry to say we know nothing of it here.

Lord Palmerston's bill for the suppression of the Portuguese slave trade having been thrown out by the Lords, he has modified its terms so as to do away with the objections that were made to it. His Lordship, in moving for leave to bring in the bill, on the 8th of August, is reported to have made a most able and eloquent speech. Sir R. Inglis rose at once to express his opposition to the bill, lest the whole glory of a measure on this subject should be left to those to whom he was politically opposed.

He could not refer to the speech in which the noble Lord had introduced the bill, without saying that it was not merely controversial in tone with respect to the other House of Parliament, but also discriminatory, yet firm and uncompromising towards foreign powers, and forcible, eloquent and conclusive in the manner in which the subject was discussed. A speech more worthy of the subject than those heard in later years scarcely can be heard. Least was given to bring in the bill, and the standing orders were suspended to admit of its going through all the stages without unnecessary delay.

On the 5th August, in the discussion on the New South Wales Bill, Mr. C. Buller contended that the time was at length come for giving the colonists a voice in the management of their own affairs. Mr. Labouchere, in reply, admitted the force of Mr. Buller's arguments, but thought the peculiar circumstances of the Australian colonies was still opposed to the immediate application of them in that quarter. Measures had been taken to put a stop to transportation. This year not half the usual number of convicts would be sent out, and they would be sent out to Norfolk Island; and directions had been sent out to the Governor to put a stop to the assignments of convicts for domestic servants and labourers. Last year 10,000 emigrants were sent out, and the Government had resolved to continue emigration on the same scale. The bill, which now stood for a third reading, merely provided for continuing the temporary government of New South Wales for one year more; the subject must, therefore, again come under consideration next year. The bill was read a third time and passed.

held on the 21st July a special meeting was held on Stinchcombe Hill, near Dursley, Gloucestershire, to celebrate the Centenary of Whitfield. The hill commands a magnificent view of the rich valley of the Severn, with the Welsh Hills and the Malverns on the opposite side; and it was in its neighbourhood that Whitfield began his out-door preaching in the country: so that the associations of the place were every way impressive and suitable. The extent of the assembly was variously estimated, but the most careful calculation gives about 7000 as the number present. On the hill there were a large number of permanent services, as well as a large un-

On the 10th of August Lord Eileborough and Lord Holden made some resolutions, in which they agreed that the abolition of the tithes was a matter of the Church of England, having divine service in his own house, being permitted to have more than twenty persons present, without subjecting himself to a penalty of £20. The Archbishop of Canterbury thought the subject worthy of consideration, yet seemed disinclined to encourage any attempt at reform.

On the 11th of August, the Lord of the manor, taking away the parishioners so as to form a society, called

The Baptists have opened a new Chapel in Lower Abbey-street, Dublin.

On the 18th of July, Dr. Robert Kiley was ordained to the ministry of the gospel at Silver Street Chapel, London, with a view to evangelical labour in the Island of Madeira. He had proposed going to China, as a Medical Missionary, in connection with the London Missionary Society; but on account of his health he had to visit Madeira, and finding both the English and Portuguese there in a state of the lowest moral and religious destitution, he has devoted himself to their instruction.

The Life of the late Dr. Morrison, of China, has been published in two Octavo Volumes. It is compiled by his widow: and a critical essay on his Literary labours, by the Rev. Samuel Kidd, is appended. Memoirs of Dr. Milne, the fellow labourer of Dr. Morrison, by the Rev. Robert Philip, are also announced and shortly to be published in one volume.

On Tuesday, July 30th, the Rev. Thomas Slatyer, appointed by the London Missionary Society to the Navigators' Islands, was ordained at Union Chapel, Brixton Hill. Mr. Slatyer has married Miss Amelia G. Austin, fourth daughter of the Rev. B. Austin, Baptist Minister, Exeter.

The subject of printing the Bible in Scotland has been re-considered. On the 28th of July, Lord John Russell stated in the House of Commons, that it was now intended to make some addition to the plan he had formerly announced. It was proposed to give power to certain parties to apply to the Lord Advocate for the true binding, to print copies of the Bible on their subscribing a declaration that the person making the application was to be "no editor," and entering into bond that they were to print according to the authorized version, transmitting a copy to the Lord Advocate, and sending the proof sheets to the Secretary to the Board. This proposal was proposed to be granted by the House of the Scottish Episcopal Church, and was afterwards authorized by the General Assembly, and was sanctioned by pro-prietarys, or Independent or Baptist clergymen, recommended by the ministers of their respective congregations.

The Sheffield Iris says, that a new Roman Catholic Church has been opened at Everingham, in a style of splendour unequalled in England. The building cost 30,000*l*. A great deal too much importance is now attached both by Romanists and others, to the brick and mortar of Churches.

A crowded meeting of Roman Catholics has been held at Freemasons' Hall, to make a declaration of their views on education. Resolutions were passed, approving of the grant of public money for the erection of schools, and an apportionment of the fund among all classes of religionists, in the ratio of subscriptions from adults for the same purpose.

In the beginning of August it is observed, that the Duchess of Kent again goes to the Opera, and takes morning rides with the Queen. The King and Queen of the Belgians, with an extensive retinue, were expected to visit her Majesty at Windsor Castle, immediately after the termination of the fete at Brussels.

Mr. Robert Owen, the Socialist, has been presented to the Queen at her levee, by Lord Melbourne. He bore an address from "the Congress of Delegates of the Universal Society of Rational Religionists," praying for an investigation of the measures proposed by the Congress "to ameliorate the condition of society." Such a presentation, it would be difficult to justify, either in regard of decorum or prudence.

The John Bull bears testimony, in the highest terms of eulogy, to the excellency of Lord Eglinton's conduct in Ireland. The chief points of commendation are the purity and decorum of the vice-regal court, his Lordship's constant attendance on the services of religion, and his unostentatious impartiality towards all classes. His Lordship is said to have been every where treated with respect and deference.

On Sunday, the 11th August, about 300 chartists marched in the afternoon from Smithfield to St. Paul's. Most of them conducted themselves prudently while there; and they separated on leaving the Cathedral.

Mr. Wallace and Mr. Banks, two botanists, sent out by the Duke of Devonshire, to gather stores for his magnificent gardens at Chatsworth, have been drowned, with nine other individuals, in attempting to run one of the rapids of the Columbia.

The Revenue Accounts for the quarter ending 31st July, 1899, exhibit an increase of £208,175 over the corresponding period of last year. The yearly comparison also shows the considerable increase of £2,076,619. The comparison, however, is made with a remarkably unproductive period.

On the 10th of August the city and market reports say, that the news from China had excited a good deal of interest among the importers and dealers in tea, and much higher prices are demanded. Dollars, as the only substitute for Opium in purchases of tea, have risen in price, and are not to be had in sufficient quantity. The stock of tea has been diminishing for the last two years. The imports of 1867, after deducting the exports, fell short of the consumption by 2,743,000 lbs.; and in 1868 there was a similar deficiency of 4,198,000 lbs. The stock on the 31st December last was 51,216,000 lbs., which, it is said, will be further diminished this year.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

WESLEYAN CENTENARY AT MADRAS.

On Thursday evening last, a meeting was held in the Wesleyan Chapel, Poplar's Broad-way, preparatory to the more public services intended to be conveyed in October next, in commemoration of the CENTENARY of Methodism. The chapel was well filled, though not crowded; the greater part of those present being members of the Connexion. The principal object of the meeting appeared to be a raising of subscriptions in aid of the Centenary Fund, in order that the October meetings may be exclusively set apart for devotional purposes.

The subscriptions at the meeting, and immediately afterwards, amounted to upwards of five thousand rupees—a very considerable sum, when the situation and circumstances in life of the great majority of those present, are considered. We have not heard what is the aggregate amount expected to be raised in aid of the Fund in connection with the various stations belonging to the Madras District, though we should imagine from so good a beginning, that a sum not less than ten thousand rupees will be the ultimate result of the collections in Southern India.

The addresses on Thursday evening were, for the most part, appropriate and edifying in keeping with the occasion, and spirit manifested, at home. The Rev. J. Croxson, who presided, referred to the origin of Wesleyan Methodism, and at some length explained the object of the CENTENARY and the several purposes to which it was intended to devote the monies collected. We are happy to find that a great proportion of the Fund is likely to be applied to either direct or secondary missionary purposes. In alluding to his own personal obligations to Wesleyan Methodism, the rev. gentleman addressed the assembly in a strain at once so scriptural and unostentatious, as to elevate the tone of the meeting and to stamp its proceedings with a simplicity and sanctity which could have none other than a pure and grateful origin. We looked in vain for that unlovely combination of seriousness and levity, of piety and flippancy, of heavenly principle secularized by earthly feeling, which the Friend of India so fairly speaks of as the characteristic of the assembly at those Centenary meetings. Excitement, no doubt, there was; but then it was of that chaste and hallowed kind, which the book divine itself recommends when it says, "It is good to be zealously affected in a good thing."

The same course was adopted by the remaining speakers, both clerical and lay, all of whom humbly and gratefully acknowledged how much they were indebted to the Connexion, and how sincerely and prayerfully-anxious they were to promote its interests, and through it, the best interests of their fellow men. We were particularly pleased with the observations of the Rev. Mr. Arthur, who, in language simple and eloquent, gave utterance to the warm emotions of his genuine Irish heart with reference to the benefits which he, as an Irishman, had received from Wesleyan Methodism, and to the good which it had already effected among his countrymen. The speaker related an anecdote which we cannot forget recording. It appears that at the Centenary meeting held in Dublin, half a crown was found in one of the collection bags enclosed in a piece of paper on which were written words to this effect: A servant mind desires to thank God that this money will not be left to buy prayers for her soul after she is dead—to which Mr. Arthur added, that there were many hundreds now in Ireland who could heartily join in the thanksgiving, and trace their present views and feelings to the instrumentality of Methodism.

In the course of the evening, a portion of that beautiful hymn "A HUNDRED YEARS AGO," by James Montgomery, the sweet singer of Sheffield, was sung by the congregation with a feeling and effect beyond any thing of the kind that we recollect at Madras. Appropriate prayers were offered at the commencement and close of the service. Our respected friends of the Wesleyan Connexion have much cause for congratulation at this harmonious and auspicious commencement of their CENTENARY Festival.—Madras Circular.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

With regard to lands acknowledged to be subject to assessment, he said, I will not, like my predecessors, annoy the occupants by continual assessments and measures, I will merely make an average demand, according to the rents which have been paid to me, for the last three years, from each village, or portion of land, of which the accounts have been given in, and will limit the rest of such for ever accordingly. But the occupants, on the other hand, must engage to give me now, and from year to year, accurate accounts, in order that I may be able to ascertain what lands I have thus settled for, and what not; and also, that my officers may have the power of protesting and defining individual rights. The parties all professed to agree to these conditions; and it is quite clear what advantages they must have gained from the clemency and liberality of their new master. Without altering the principle of these engagements, John afterwards found that it was necessary to pass new laws for procedure in the recovery of his rights; and, at length, as the ordinary Courts of Justice were constantly engaged in disposing of the business of private individuals, he was obliged to constitute Special Courts to settle the question pending between himself and his Landholders, which, to the inconvenience and loss of the country generally, had been from year to year delayed.

These special investigations being for some time proceeded with, it was found that few of the claims against the Proprietor, for exemption from rent, stood the test of examination; that true statements, as required, had seldom been submitted; that false names had been very generally registered; that in many cases a single individual, in occupation of vast tracts had, to avoid more immediate inquiry, registered the whole in different parcels, and under different names; sometimes in names of priests who had never been the occupants, or, perhaps, never existed; and sometimes in the names of Idols and Temples equally fictitious. In a thousand ways deceptions had been practised; and the Proprietor said, I cannot, in justice to the other inhabitants of my property, for whom I have much to do and to expend, yield up my whole rights; but, notwithstanding the way in which I have been deprived of them, I will proceed for their recovery, only through a judicial enquiry; and even where the award is in my favour, I will only levy a portion of the rent from you, to which, according to my compact, I am entitled.

Any person who takes the trouble to peruse the accounts of the first acquisition of land revenue in Bengal and Behar of the East India Company, and the regulations from time to time enacted for its recovery, will find the above illustration strictly applicable, and the conduct of the imaginary Proprietor, there described, to tally exactly with that pursued by the Government of this country.

The report, therefore, as to Government having tacitly yielded up their right to assess, when the question came to be tried, is wholly without foundation; so is that, given credence to only by the ignorant, of the Lakerajars being dispossessed of their land by the present proceedings. Yet so prevalent has the latter report been, that I have heard of many poor Brahmins in Bengal hearing their cases all through under this supposition, who, when they found that assessment only would be the consequence of the decision against them, have expressed agreeable surprise and astonishment. As to the loss and destruction of documents between the period of registry in 1783, and the present, it should be recollected, that in the interval the country has enjoyed perfect tranquillity, and yet Lakerajars pretended, at the time of registry, to have documents, which, if their representations be correct, must have been preserved during treble that period, whilst the country was suffering from continued war and disturbance. As to the hardship of Priests being deprived of their lands; such a representation is most easily answered, as the Government never so deprived them; whereas, throughout Bengal, they have been dispossessed, to an enormous extent, by the Zemindars, of tenses, which, as being excluded from the decennial settlement, and in excess of those yielded in case of invalidity by the Government to the Zemindars, they can have no possible claim. The exertions and advocacy, therefore, of the Landholders on this subject, are about as sincere as those of a shark would be, for the safety of a ship being shipwrecked, to the crew of which he had already devoured; and their pity about as great as that of lawyers in a certain court for their clients, whose whole properties, whilst under litigation, are gradually coming within their merciful grasp in the shape of fees, &c. &c. I cannot ask you to occupy your columns with the numerous cases which have been mentioned to me of large tracts of land attempted to be gained possession of by Zemindars and Landholders, by fraudulently causing alterations to be made in the Revenue Records. One glaring case of the kind was some years since detected in the principal Revenue Record Office in Calcutta, where the correspondence, as to the price to be paid the Record Keeper was actually discovered. I cannot either trouble you with instances where large tracts have been proved to have been held all along by the Zemindars themselves, though registered carefully in the names of different individuals; nor yet with instances of the hundreds of Brahmins who have been forcibly driven from the greater part of their lands by their compassionate advocates. It is sufficient to say that I know, from unquestionable authority, that many such cases, as above described, are on record.

With such cases starting our Government in the face, it would be any thing but justice to cease from all enquiry, or to put an "end to resumption." As long as Land Revenue is collected, I fear some description of resumption laws must remain in force; and, indeed, the only way which appears to me of settling the question satisfactorily, and thereby securing both public and private rights, and guarding against the corruption of our Native Officers, would be through a general survey. By this means rightful owners would be secured in the possessions given them, at the decennial settlement, and an end to be-nance and seditious holdings would ensue; and thus, whether Government and its rent-payers, or private individuals be the contending parties, our Courts would be free from the obstructions to justice which the present unsettled state admits of. Then might the poor man fearlessly come forward for the protection of his inheritance, and defy the corruption, bribery, and oppression wrought against him by his adversary and the rapacious Amils. Then, too, by removing the chief cause of the evil, would general improvement take place in the conduct and faith of our Native Officers. Let the Landholders, if they are disinterestedly striving for the good of their country, look at the advantages which would follow the measure now alluded to.

Notwithstanding all I have said, in advocacy of fair and equitable resumption, I am not at all blind to many objections existing to the present mode of procedure in the suits of Government—objections so easily removed, without any change in the principle of the law, that it is a matter of such surprise that some effectual steps are not taken for the purpose. Many cases, too, I admit, call most loudly for the leniency of Government, more especially those in which public and recorded real purchases of rent-free lands have been made; and I think an allowance at the time of settlement should always be made in these.

As a mode, too, of bringing the question to a more speedy termination, and saving parties from expense and annoyance, I, in my humble judgement, am a strenuous advocate for a compromise with the Lakerajars, in cases not yet determined. I hear that this is objected to, from a consideration that it would involve the necessity of extending the same terms to those whose lands have been already assessed, according to the ordinary course of the law. I cannot, however, view the proposition in this light, because, in a compromise now for lands, not yet adjudged liable to assessment, mutual advantages would be reaped by both parties, the State and the tax-payer. Government would be saved an enormous expense, and Lakerajars could thus be afforded, in consideration of the saving which their compromise admitted of, a settlement on more easy terms than otherwise. Those, too, who chose to contest their claims, might be allowed the option of doing so; and, certainly, when we look at the proportion of the cases given in favour of Government, it is reasonable to expect that an offer of the kind would be received as an act of generosity; nor could it ever be attributed to a feeling, on the part of Government, that their claims were questionable.

I am, Mr. Editor,

Your obedient servant,

A. B.

Sept. 12th, 1839.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—I have been for some time a reader of your useful weekly publication, The Friend of India, and think that you have fully identified yourself with its title. May you long be preserved to expose the fallacies of all false systems of religion; to show the absurdities of Hindoo superstitions, and to lead the public mind in the way of truth!

In some of your later numbers you have stepped somewhat out of your way to find fault with a branch of the Church of Christ, remote enough, with both its faults and its virtues, from the City of Palaces. I allude to your remarks on the Centenary proceedings of the Wesleyan Methodists. I will not now dwell on the impropriety of making an unprovoked attack on an absent body of men, but proceed at once to offer to you a few remarks on the subject of the Centenary. I shall be glad if they call up some worthier and abler advocate of a Church, which has to learn the art of shrinking from thorough investigation; and through you may not yourself deem them of much value I hope, at least, that you will give them a place in some early number of The Friend of India.

It has pleased God, who works by whom he will, to bless the foolishness of preaching among the Wesleyan Methodists to an extent unparalleled in the modern history of the Church. By the divinely appointed, and divinely honoured instrumentality of the Wesleyan Ministry, thousands and tens of thousands have been brought out of darkness into God's marvellous light; led to the only Saviour, by the only way, the simple way of faith; have obtained the forgiveness of their sins, and the witness of the Spirit to the fact of their adoption; in a word, have been led from the road which leads to Hell, to the path which leads to happiness and Heaven. Men thus changed by divine grace, have, in most instances, esteemed the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; and, conformably to the commandment of their Divine Master, they have laid up their treasures in Heaven, and as stewards of the earthly property committed to their care, they have been willing to part with the whole of it, when for the glory of God.

Here, if I mistake not, is the true key to the present liberality of the Wesleyan Churches. Let it be remembered, that giving is not a lesson the Wesleyans have now to learn. Although literally a poor people, in great trials of affliction, the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty have abounded to the riches of their liberality. For to their power I bear regard, yes, and beyond their power, they have been willing of themselves. And now that their Churches are preserved, through a period of one hundred years, with the same unaltered doctrinal doctrines; under the exercise of the same scriptural discipline, with peace in all their borders; with increasing prosperity both at home and abroad, and with the God of Jacob dwelling in their midst, would it not be strange if they did not testify their gratitude to God in some marked manner? Would not the very stones cry out against them? The shout of a King is heard in their camp; and I would to God, Sirs, that all the Churches, who hold the Head, had the same cause and the same heart for rejoicing.

* It is not my object to defend the proceedings of the public meeting mentioned by you, as having been held in London. I should regret, as sincerely as yourself, that any thing should be said or done on such occasions, calculated to give just offence to judicious and candid Christians. But to take any one meeting, admitting it to have been faulty, as a standard by which to judge of all other meetings, or to take your own feelings, when coolly reading the report of the meeting in your Editorial study, as the standard by which to measure the aberrations from the line of strict propriety of a few warm-hearted men, when stimulated by a lively sense of gratitude, and stirred up by generous example, is scarcely fair. That a deep sense of the presence of God,—a lively feeling of gratitude to him, and a strong desire to be entirely devoted to his glory, have constituted the prevailing spirit of the Centenary meetings in England, we have abundance of evidence, both from public and private sources. And, supposing that in a few instances things have been said, or measures adopted, of which we may not entirely approve, ought we not to point them out in the spirit of brotherly kindness, rather than hold them up to obloquy and contempt? And, more especially in Calcutta, where there is not an individual, I believe, to represent the society, or to hold up a hand for the "sect every where spoken against."

An account of a meeting held in Madras last week, has just reached me; and I am happy to say that the prevailing feeling was that of loving gratitude. I have pleasure in sending you, along with this letter, a copy of a Madras Paper, the Editor of which was present, and, as a member of another Church, he may be fairly considered an impartial judge. At the Madras Meeting, the people proved that they had not drunk into the inebriating spirit of suspicion, so prevalent at the present day. Without any excitement, save that of gratitude to God for good received, and without any formal speeches, the people came forward, and of their own free will, contributed a sum of somewhat more than Five Thousand Rupees, to the Fund for Centenary purposes. Now, Sirs, I would say to the Baptist Church in Calcutta, and to every other Church in India—"Go thou and do likewise."

Only yesterday I received a letter from a gentleman, who, a few years ago was brought to a saving knowledge of the truth, by the instrumentality of one of our Missionaries, in which he requests me to enter his name on my Centenary List for four hundred and sixty rupees, for himself and family. In this case I give you the word of a servant of Christ, that I have neither asked him to subscribe, nor hinted in any way that I wished him to do so; and so far from being under the influence of excitement, he has been living at a station for some time where the only means of grace within his reach, are those conducted by himself, for the benefit of the members of his own family.

We are grateful to God for the extraordinary, though very seasonable, liberality, which has been so generally manifested on the occasion of this, our Connexional Festival; but our chief joy arises from the prospect of that influence, which, by the blessing of God, it may fairly be expected to exert. Immediately of the Connexion itself, and mediately on the whole Church of Christ, and on the world at large. In the year, 1789, we see two or three Ministers going forth, trusting in God, and preaching salvation by faith alone. In 1839, we see the little one become a thousand, yea, ten thousand, and the ten thousand going forth, preaching the same doctrine; maintaining the same discipline; breathing the same spirit, and determining, by the grace of God, to hold on their course, till the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the place of the great deep. Compared with this, millions on millions of pounds, sink into insignificance. Here, then, as a point worthy of your notice; and not only of yours, but that of the friends of the world. If the Wesleyan Ministers are, in truth, the servants of God; and if the Centenary Year may fairly be considered as a point from which they start anew in the honoured service of their Master, then let all Christendom, in the true spirit of prayer, wish them success in the name of the Lord.

I am,
Yours, in the service of Christ,
T. CHURCH,
Wesleyan Missionary.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIRS,—I have read your able paper on the want of reformation in the present system of Police. I have also read the effusion of "Philinda" in your last issue; and agreeing with you that in the employment of European agency, on points the only adequate and immediate remedy for existing abuses in the above department, I will trouble you with a few observations on the contents of Philinda's letter.

He states,—how correctly I will not presume to determine,—that "the only Europeans available now, every officer being wanted with his corps, would be the same description of men that are being employed as Deputy Collectors under Reg. IX." Now, when you, Mr. Editor, give insertion to letters from anonymous Correspondents, which indirectly tend to impugn the character, for efficiency, even of so insignificant a class as the European Unconvenanted Deputy Collectors, you must not feel surprised at being made, to a certain extent, responsible for their accuracy; and as it is natural to suppose you understand what you print, I shall, as one of the U. D. C.'s, feel much obliged by an explanation of the above quoted passage,—that "description of men" may your lucid Correspondent mean—as I fancy he will find it convenient to pass over this reply with "diffident silence," I put the question to your courtesy—"discuss the same in English unto me."

Regarding the assertion that "their work in that capacity is not so far superior to their native brethren," I must have better proof before "trusting" either him or it. But for arguments' sake, admitting this, does Philinda not recognize in the circumstance of its equalling the work of their Native brethren, great cause for extending European agency? How many of the Natives, now employed as Deputy Collectors, are men who, from early youth, have been attached to the Courts of a particular district—every clause of the Regulations familiar to them; every means adopted to enable them to obtain a correct knowledge of the duties to be performed, even prior to their appointments being made? Contrast this with the European functionary of the same class, and then let me ask Philinda whether it is not something, and something considerable, too, that European agency has already become so efficient as it is?

Philinda may be one of those who, after three years at Hileybury, and three more at Fort William, went forth prepared in knowledge of the languages, prejudices and customs of the people he was to assist in governing; and if he is, I would again ask him, is it nothing for the European, who, when appointed, was ignorant of all, or most of these, to have equalled his Native brethren in the performance of this duty? Philinda judges of the fruit before the tree has put forth a blossom; and I am sorry his judgement is so distorted. But would the assurance, that the services of Unconvenanted Europeans are daily becoming so valuable give pleasure to Philinda? I fear not. It is true, notwithstanding; and there are those among them, who, apart from "interest," will do their duty, and find their reward in the increased prospect of usefulness that duty holds out. This is a principle strongly opposed to Philinda's sweeping rule, viz., "that a man is only honest, when it is to his interest to be so;" but he must not judge even all Unconvenanted Deputy Collectors by himself. I could point out a much more straight-forward plan for adoption, should his end really be what it appears; but will spare you the infliction at present. One word more, and I have done. The Unconvenanted Deputy Collectors with whom I am acquainted, are already much more serviceable than the genality of Military "Officers" could possibly be; and are much more easily "superintended;" and if Philindo's style and spirit could be admitted, even as a mediocre criterion of the service to which, as stated above, I fear he may belong, there is no doubt but some of them would shortly compete in usefulness, even with that service itself.

In making the above remarks, I disclaim all intention to disparage any "Native brethren" They are merely written in reply to what I cannot but consider a gratuitous insult to the very few European Unconvenanted Deputy Collectors in the service of Government.

Trusting that Philindo may be actuated by a different spirit in his next communication,

I am, Mr. Editor,

Yours very obediently,

A D. C. under Reg. IX.

THE MISSIONARY SHIP CAMDEN.—Intelligence was received at the London Missionary House, on Saturday, from one of the Missionaries who went out with Mr. Williams, and several others in the missionary ship Camden, that the Camden safely arrived at Rarotonga the beginning of February last, and had landed the Missionaries appointed to that station. They were all well, and had entered on their work with very gratifying prospects. The Camden had left with Mr. Williams, to visit the other missionary stations in the South Seas.—Pad.

THE REV. F. TAYLOR, late rector of Deeping, St. James, has relinquished his preferment in the Established Church, and joined a Dissenting congregation. Rev. William Thurst, rector of Sutton Courtsey, and the Rev. J. C. Phillips, fellow of Worcester College, Oxford, have also given up their preferments on the same grounds.—Lincoln Mercury.

EDUCATION.

RIVALRY OF UNIVERSITY AND KING'S COLLEGE.—On Friday, 28th June, the annual distribution of the prizes in the Faculty of Arts of King's College took place, the Bishop of London in the chair; on which occasion the vast disproportion of honours and degrees conferred upon the students of this College and University College were adverted to with evidently a very sore feeling. At the recent conferring of the B. A. degree in the London University, there were, in the first class of distinction, twelve students from University College, and one from King's College. The degrees conferred were in the proportion of twenty to six! The learned Principal, the Rev. Mr. Lonsdale, endeavoured to explain the circumstance by the supposition that the greater number of pupils intended for the learned professions would proceed to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; but, in that case, King's College must lose its character as a college, and, by losing its proper relation to the London University, will be reduced to a mere high school. The Rev. Thomas Dale, M. A., formerly a Professor in the University College, now Professor of English Literature and History in the King's College, went so far as to congratulate the supporters of the latter College upon the small number of degrees obtained by its students, expressing his hope that, in future, they would go to the old Universities for degrees! He expatiated on the higher honour of degrees conferred by those venerable bodies, as compared with what could be obtained at a University which bears date with the new system of marriage and parish registers, and which the reverend Professor stigmatised as belonging to the same period, there being "in the one a marriage without a church, and in the other, a university without a Bible!" This indecent outburst of bigotry occurred in the hearing of three bishops who are members of the Senate of the London University, upon which the gratuitous insult was cast; but no notice was taken of it. It is evident, that the establishment of this University is a mere mortification and discouragement to the Tory portion of the founders and supporters of King's College, whose main object in setting up that institution was to crush the then infant University College. But, having once entered into competition with it, the backing out recommended by Professor Dale, will be tantamount to an inglorious defeat; nor will the honour of the College be saved by the hollow pretext which religious hypocrisy would assign for its failure.—Ibid.

SCIENTIFIC.

SOUTHERN PINE FOREST.—The spacious building pond, which is now being excavated at South Stockton, has led to the discovery of an extensive subterranean forest. The timber is chiefly oak. A few trees, of considerable size, have been found, the wood of which is sound and good, and fit for the turner's lathe. Many of the oaks are of large dimensions, and the proprietors expect some of them will be suitable for the purpose of building. Whilst examining this forest, Dr. Young, of Whitby, with some friends, discovered one of the oaks to have been cut in two, which had evidently been done previous to its being covered by the earth. The doctor supposes the forest may have been cut down by the Roman soldiers, as they were in the habit of laying timber on the low swampy grounds, for the purpose of making roads. Be this, however, as it may, it is certain the hand of man has been exerted on the timber, and it may form a fertile subject for the lover of ancient history and the geologist to speculate on.—Ibid.

NEW AND WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.—The most important recent discovery is the one applicable to the reprinting of books, or re-production of engravings. M. Dupont, a very industrious printer, was seeking the means of saving the expense of stereotyping. With the assistance of a particular ink he was already enabled to avoid the preservation of the clichés, which require many materials, and much place and money, by the means of the preservation of a mere printed sheet, which lithography afterwards, reproduced whenever it was wanted; but doubting whether the ink used upon that sheet would retain, in course of time, the same properties, he consulted his brother, a very intelligent lithographer, and the latter found what he ventured to expect. This new process is applicable not only to fresh printed sheets, but likewise to the oldest engravings, to the oldest books, and, which is of far more interest, to Greek, Chinese, and Hebrew books. It consists in two operations. Over the page or engraving of which you want a copy, you lay a particular composition. It is placed upon the lithographic stone and pressed, and the stones reproduce, with scrupulous precision, the original engraving or book. This impression could not, however, serve such as it is. It is itself covered with the same preparation, and it may then print thousands of copies by the ordinary processes of every sort of lithography. Five minutes suffice for both operations. The original engraving may be restored to the portfolio which has supplied it, for it has not been in the slightest degree injured; the book, thus wholly repaired, may undergo another binding, and honourably resume its place in your library. This new process admits of a reduction of 75 per cent. upon the expense of printing; and as for engraving, that which on copper would have cost 100 francs, will now cost but 20 francs! What consequences will not this discovery yield! It threatens the graphic arts, engraving and printing, with a complete revolution. A man of the greatest talent for the arts lays claim to priority in this discovery, as is always the case, when success has been obtained, claims come in. The wisdom of the central jury and patent laws must decide the question. In the meantime M. Duponts are manufacturing, which is always a great point. On Monday the King, Queen, Madame d'Alais, and Princess Clementine visited again the exposition, and examined the lithographic produce of the brothers. His Majesty observing an engraved head of Albert Durer, of 1567, which was wanting in his collection of the Palais Royal, ordered a copy of it, congratulated M. Duponts upon a discovery whereby there would be no longer any scarce engravings or books.—Paris Periodical.

EFFECTS OF LIGHTNING.—On Monday evening last, during a thunder-storm, which visited Truro, and continued for about an hour with considerable violence, the clock at St. Mary's Church tower was found to have stopped; and, on examination, it appeared that the stoppage had been occasioned by the minute hand and hour hand of the watch dial having become entangled, at twenty minutes before eight, in consequence, it is believed, of having been struck by the lightning. The flash which is supposed to have produced this singular effect, was particularly large and vivid, and was followed immediately by a loud report like the explosion of a cannon. The clock was not, we believe, otherwise injured and was set going a short time afterwards. A daughter of Mrs. Harvey, in the High Cross, Truro, who was watching the lightning playing round the top of the spire, having a pair of steel scissors in her hand, was struck at the same time as the clock, and did not recover so as to be able to speak till three o'clock the next morning. She says all she remembers is a severe and sudden shock in her hand, when she instinctively dropped the scissors, and also being surrounded with fire. The tip of her finger nails were seared.—West Briton.

AWFUL VISITATION.—On Wednesday morning, Hertford and its vicinity were visited by one of the most terrible thunder-storms known for several years. Between 11 and 12 o'clock Mr. W. Cannon, a respectable farmer residing at Tewin, was in a flood at the back of the mill, in company with his son Henry, a lad about 11 years old, a ploughman, named William Bennett, of the age of 21; and three other individuals. Approaching the approaching storm, the former three very imprudently repaired to an ash tree for shelter. They had not, however, remained in that situation many moments before the electric fluid slightly grazed the bark of the tree, and struck each of them, throwing Hatchett to the ground. Mr. Dickens, sitting at Hereford, on examination of the sufferers, found that, with the exception of the boy, they had received great injury. A wound was in the right foot of the ploughman, and he was burnt down the right side. The case of Mr. Cannon was alarming and singular. The whole of the upper leather of the shoe was left on the foot, with the exception of a small oval piece near the ankle, but the sole was completely removed, and found at a considerable distance in the field; a nail had been driven from the shoe into the heel of the sufferer, and about the middle of the sole of the foot was a wound which nearly separated the foot, and exactly corresponded with an incision in the shoe. He was also severely burnt down the left side, and there is little hope of his recovery. The boy was scorched down the back. Four horses were also struck, but escaped without any material injury. Put.

MISCELLANEOUS.

COMPLIMENT TO HER MAJESTY.—Tuesday a man was taken to the station-house for drunkenness, when, on being searched, the following extraordinary printed card was found in his possession:—"A raffle and ball will take place at Mr. Morgan's, the Nan-lid, Gower-street, for a live pig, on Thursday evening, June 20th, 1859, in commemoration of Her Majesty's accession to the throne. Tickets 8d. each, and 2d. allowed for refreshment." &c.—Ibid.

STEAM DUTIES BILL.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 28th June, moved the third reading.

Mr. Ewart urged the right hon. gent. to postpone the consideration of the bill, and stated that he had not the opportunity at that late hour to procure the attention of hon. members to the motion of which he had given notice. (The cry of "Go on, go on.") Mr. Ewart then adverted to the present state of the sugar trade, and directed the attention of hon. members to the supply in the market, which, he said, was inadequate to meet the public demand. The hon. member had been struck by the great consumption of sugar, as compared with other articles. It was well known that the consumption of cocoa had increased; tea had been more stationary. It would be found, on a comparison, that in 1801 the annual consumption of tea was one pound six ounces per man. In the present year, one pound four ounces per man. Coffee had been upon the increase. In 1801, each individual consumed not more than one ounce; in 1811, eight ounces; in 1821, about the same quantity; in 1831, it was five ounces; and in 1836 the consumption increased to six ounces. With respect to sugar they had retrograded. The consumption at the present day was less than it was thirty years ago. The hon. member expressed a hope that further commerce would be made to India, and that East Indian sugar, or free-labour sugar, might be allowed to form a larger portion of our supply. In Singapore, Siam, and Java, the sugar-trade might be improved to the advantage of this country. Siam was capable of producing 15,000 tons of sugar, and all the produce of free labour. The next source of importation would be the Philippines. In Java they could furnish 20,000 tons; the labourers were all free. From China they might import 6,000 tons. From Cochin China, 1,000 tons. All this might be obtained without resorting to the odious practice of the slave-trade. He also looked for a supply to the coast of Africa. If they could once induce commerce to rest on the coast of Africa, the slave-trade would be at an end. Coffee had been imported from Sierra Leone; and if that article, the produce of free labour, was encouraged, it would convince Africa that she might escape from the darkness to which she had been so long subject. A death-blow would be given to the slave-trade, which could not be suppressed by armed vessels. They held out by the encouragement of African commerce the brightest prospects for the friends of humanity, and would meet the danger of an inadequate supply of sugar, which then hung over the country. He was sure they would have much to say in supplying our markets by free labour. (Hear.) He was anxious to see the United States of America as an example in the cultivation of sugar by free labour, and thereby exterminate the odious traffic in slaves. If he could succeed in his object, he should rejoice that he had brought the subject before the House. The hon. member concluded by moving that sugar, the produce of free labour, be imported upon the same terms as sugar from the West India colonies.

Mr. Paine seconded the amendment.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not consider the suggestion of his hon. friend so trivial as some might suppose. It involved many important considerations. It opened the whole of our colonial policy; at the same time he was not prepared to say they were compelled to select one community in preference to all others; and when the question came before the House, he should be ready to discuss it. If the time should come when the supply of West India sugar became restricted, he should be ready to consider the best means of obtaining a larger supply. It had been said the people of this country looked back with regret to the 20,000,000 given to the slave-holders. He did not think that could be the case, because this country had taken a humane and generous course, which must excite the admiration of the world. He did not think any measure like that suggested by his hon. friend would induce America to abandon their internal government with respect to slaves.

Mr. Clay said all the sugar refiners of London were interested in this question. It so happened that the contingency upon which his right hon. friend would listen to the proposition of the member for Wigan had actually occurred. There was not an adequate supply of sugar in the market. At the present moment, the bounty in drawback on refined sugar was equal to six pence; but the fact was, the supply of sugar was not adequate to the wants of the people in this country. It was a remarkable fact that we took 400,000,000 pounds of slave-grown sugar from the United States, yet we did not take one pound of slave-grown sugar. He thought, however, there was a clear proof that the supply of sugar was inadequate, and that we had no right to give our own colonies a monopoly in that article.

Mr. P. Thomson could not admit that there was a bounty of 6s. on refined sugar in the shape of drawback. It was a delusion to talk of introducing to this country new but the sugars of free labour. It was a delusion to suppose they could place a restriction on one article of slave produce and not on another. How could they take the produce of Siam and not that of America.

Mr. Ewart withdrew his amendment, and the bill was read a third time and passed.—Ibid.

COMMERCIAL (JOINT STOCK) BANK OF LONDON.—The excitement which now prevails in the City as to the value of the Bank of England, has had a powerful effect in drawing attention to the new scheme of joint-stock banking in 18s. of shares, by the proposed Commercial Bank of London. All acknowledge the necessity of a great change, but many doubt the joint-stock banking system without a paid-up capital in large sums from each shareholder. If this proposed new bank be aided by all the malcontents which the extraordinary departure from constant usage and good faith by the Bank has occasioned, it will be the greatest banking establishment ever known. There are not two opinions on the subject.—Morning Post.

THE CROPS.—We hear from quarters of the most gratifying nature as to the crops. A grain of every description, and particularly wheat, is vigorous, forward, and abundant. There has rarely been a better promise for the harvest, and should the promise be realized, it will be a blessing of the first importance to the productive, and especially to the working classes, who have felt the effects of the late bad harvest in many ways—in the high price of food, in the direct injury done to trade, and in the derangement of the money market. During the last fortnight the weather has been every thing that could be wished—alternate rain and sun-shine, with a prevalence of the true summer warmth, which was most of all wanted. The only exception to our favourable agricultural report is, that the crops of peas are light, but they will turn out better than could have been hoped for a fortnight since.—Leeds Mercury.

A NEW NOTICE FROM THE POST-OFFICE has been issued, stating that on and from the 20th of June, 1859, letters would be forwarded by morning mails to Ireland, Scotland, and the North. The letter-boxes at the receiving-houses will be open till seven a.m. for newspapers, and eight a.m. for letters; and those at the branch offices, Charing-cross, Old Cavendish-street, and the Borough, for the reception of newspapers till half-past seven a.m., and for letters until eight a.m. At the General Post-office and at the branch office in Lombard-street, the boxes will close for newspapers at a quarter before eight a.m., and for letters at half-past eight a.m. Mails despatched at nine a.m. For Brighton and Windsor, the letter-boxes at the receiving-houses will be open till seven a.m. for newspapers, and eight a.m. for letters; and those at the branch offices, Charing-cross, Old Cavendish-street, and Borough, for the reception of newspapers till half-past eight a.m., and for letters until nine a.m. The boxes at the General Post-office and at the Lombard-street branch-office will close for newspapers at nine a.m., and for letters at a quarter before ten a.m. Mails despatched at half-past ten a.m.—Put.

BLACK CATTLE.—It is generally admitted that black cattle are higher priced at present than they have been since the termination of the French war. The complaint of death in horns and hummel stuck met us at every stop on Wednesday last.

EXPORT OF TALLOW FROM THE HIGHLANDS.—The progress of the railroads in England and Scotland has lately caused a great demand for fire wood in this part of the country. The sound of the axe and the saw-mill are heard in the loneliest and most remote parts of the Highlands. We have heard of one proprietor selling his fire wood for 10,000l., and another for 5,000l. Within the last eight or ten years, a vast number of sales of this had been effected, ranging from eight or ten thousand to as many hundreds each. A considerable amount of shipping is engaged in this trade; and the vessels that carry out the timber in the shape of railroad-sleepers, pit-props, &c., generally return with cargoes of coals, lime, and other commodities. The number of men employed in felling the trees, sawing them up, and exporting them, is also a source of advantage to the country. A great trade has thus sprung up, the arbutus, we trust, of extended commerce in our northern regions. When the Duke of Devon, about five years ago, sold his mighty forest of Glenmore for £10,000, the sum was considered unprecedented; yet the same timber would now, from superior management, as well as superior value in the market, be worth more than treble the amount. Previously to this period, the Lord of Grant, it is said, sold his timber at the rate of 1s. 8d. for what one man could cut and manufacture in a year! Thus, our fine forests have been thinned and destroyed, and the scenery degraded by one of the ugliest ornaments and most valuable products.—London Courier.

PLAN FOR DISPENSING A MOB.—In the published accounts of the recent riots in Liverpool, it is stated that Mr. Whitty had dispersed a mob by playing a fire-engine on them. We learn from the Rev. K. L. Venables' "Domestic Scenes in Russia," that this plan is regularly employed for dispersing a drunken Russian mob. "A number of fire-engines were," he says, "stationed round the houses, to be useful not only in the event of fire, but as assistants to the police in keeping order; thus, in case of a mob of drunken and disorderly persons assembling at night, an engine playing into the midst of them very speedily disperses the crowd."—Put.

A SUCCESSFUL SUIT AT LAW.—In the Insolvent Court, on Thursday, John Cullingham, a simple-looking personage, attired in a clean smock frock, presented himself, to be released from carcere vite. It appeared that the insolvent had brought an action for an assault, and got it damages. He had been put into prison for the assault. Mr. Creswell remarked that he had gained a loss. Chief Commissioner: You had better pocket the £100 another time, than by bringing an action get yourself into prison. The insolvent was ordered to be discharged.—Ibid.

DREAFTFUL THUNDER-STORMS, WORCESTER.—During the week this city and neighborhood have been visited by several severe thunder-storms. The first commenced about half-past eight o'clock on Thursday, and lasted two hours. At its height the rain fell accompanied by showers of hail stones of immense size, which laid large tracts of grass, and did considerable damage to the crops. At Stour, Chaddesley, Corbet, Botherington, Harvington, Shrewton, Elmley, and part of Harbury, the crops of wheat and barley are wholly destroyed to the extent of several hundred acres. Mr. Joseph Martin, of Stour, had fifteen hands washed down to the bottom of a field, where they floated in four feet of water; and it was only by the greatest exertions of several men that they were rescued. A tree near the Mitre Oak at Harbury was shivered to pieces by the lightning. The houses of the inhabitants in the lower part of the village were flooded, some of them five feet deep, with the rain. The hail had the appearance of small fragments of ice, several inches in circumference. Yesterday (Wednesday) we were again visited with a storm, more terrible in its effects than either of the former; and we regret to add, not unattended with loss of life, and serious damage to property. This storm, which did not last more than half an hour, came on about a quarter past five o'clock. Mr. Mitton, of the Old House Farm, near this city, lost his life under the following circumstances: his son, a child about seven years of age, had gone into the field with a person who was feeding the cows to be milked, seeing the storm coming on, Mr. Mitton remarked to his wife that the child would get wet, and he immediately put a halter upon the pony and rode off to bring back the child; but, in passing through the second field from his house, when he was in the centre of it, both he and the pony were struck dead by the electric fluid.—Worcester Journal.—Local papers state that a similar storm visited Canterbury, Dover, Ramsgate, and various other places on the east coast.—Put.

CHAPEL BUILDING FUND.—The Treasurer of Highbury College has lately received a remittance of £100, from the Rev. John Woodbridge, of Jamaica, as his grateful tribute of acknowledgment for the support and advantage he received when a student at Highbury, now Highbury College. In the same letter he says, "I am grieved to see so little done for the progress of the Metropolitan Chapel Building Society—and that the meeting at Exeter Hall was so thinly attended; for I am convinced that the most important way of spreading the Gospel abroad would be the erection of large chapels in London and other towns. I have great pleasure in sending £100 in furtherance of the object."—Ibid.

NEW YORK CONSPIRACY.—If Mr. Cathwood's panorama should burn down, why would he be like an orphan?—Because he would not have a pa nor an un-uncle.—New York Paper.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—It is to be illuminated at night by the Bude light. The principle of illumination is to be that of reflection upon the face of the dial, and not of transparency, as is the case with all the other illuminated clocks in the metropolis.—Put.

AN INQUEST has been held on the body of a young man who died from an improper application of the air-pump. Verdict—"Accidental death." The deceased was very deaf; he had frequently been relieved by air forced from a pump up his nostrils by Dr. Turnbull. On the last occasion of the application, by one of Dr. Turnbull's assistants, he fell back senseless, and expired no more.—Ibid.

A WOMAN STRANGLED.—An extremely dissipated, drunken, and disorderly woman, of the name of Elizabeth Kenyon, all Wednesday had been drinking gin, and at night went to bed intoxicated, in her house. But in that unquiet which intoxication often creates, she fell out of bed, and her bonnet becoming fastened between the bedstead or bed post and the wall, she was so drunk as not to be able to unloose the strings, and was in consequence strangled.—Ibid.

THE CHARTIST WHISTLE.—An ingenious little plaything under this name has been sold freely in this town during the last few weeks. It is made of tin, and in the interior is formed a small reservoir of air or ink, or some other dust or fluid. The blow-pipe communicates with the reservoir, and of course the inexperienced operator is sure to receive the contents in his eyes the moment he attempts to blow the whistle. The whistle itself is a practical joke, and a very good one. The ingenious mechanic, however, who invented it, no doubt intended it to convey an important moral lesson, viz. that the leaders of the Chartists are throwing dust in the eyes of their followers, in order to secure some advantage to themselves. We understand one of the whistles was exhibited to the bench of magistrates the other day. The name was stated, but the modus operandi was not. One of the worthy justices, eager to hear the terrible sound, immediately put it to his lips, and so quickly received part of an ounce of flour in his eyes. It is unnecessary to say, that the incident was too much for the gravity of the Court, and it was some time before it could be sufficiently restored to allow of a dignified procedure with judicial business.—Reading Observer.

SLAVERY.—MR. HUME voted against Ministers last night on the Jamaica question; he is only one of the ten gentlemen who voted against the measure on the former occasion that repeated his vote last night.—Globe.

WEST INDIES.—Mr. Labouchere had great satisfaction in stating that information had been received from Tobago that the Legislature of that colony had passed laws on the subject of vagrancy and contracts in exact conformity with the orders in council. Also, in the Island of St. Vincent a law on the subject of contracts, in exact conformity with the order in council, had been passed by the Legislature.—Put.

HAZARD, JUNE 14.—The address of the two Chambers is to be presented to the King to-day. We are anxious to learn how his Majesty will receive it. It is supposed that the Chambers will be immediately dissolved, new elections ordered, and the Assembly convoked in the autumn, June 17. In the address presented to the King (who declared that he would examine it himself and through others), the most important point is the declaration of the Estates, "that an agreement, in the nature of a compact, between the King and the country, is necessary for the satisfaction of the people." By this it is thought that the interference of the Diet may be avoided. But it may be doubted whether this will be considered as satisfactory, as several Deputies have not proper power, and so many protests have been presented to the Diet.—Ibid.

U. S. STEAMING LINE.—PHILADELPHIA, JUNE 1.—One of the boldest sea-faring adventures ever attempted has recently been accomplished by Captain Crane. He arrived in New York on Monday last, in a small iron steam-boat, from London, in forty-two days. This little steamer is only 71 feet long, has 10 feet beam, and is registered 15 tons. Only sails were used on the voyage. One man was lost overboard in a tempest. The steamer is named the Robert Starkton, and she is intended to ply on the Delaware and Marston Canal. The Captain is quite the lion of the day.—Ibid.

50 PER CENT REDUCTION IN THE PRICE OF BOOKS.
NOTICE is hereby given, that the interest of Mr. W. H. ALLEN in our establishment, ceased on the 31st December last, from which date Mr. GEORGE FARREY was admitted a partner therein. W. THACKER & CO.
St. Andrew's Library, 14th October, 1859.

In making the above announcement to his long tried friends and the Indian literary public generally, Mr. THACKER has the pleasure of informing them of his being about to carry into effect that which has long been on his heart with a material reduction in the price of books. Convinced from long experience of the necessity of this, he has been with sincere regret that he has hitherto found it impossible to comply with the wishes of his constituents; but circumstances now enable him to make an alteration, not more advantageous to their interests, than agreeable to his own feelings.

From the 1st Proximo no higher advance than 25 per cent. upon the English price will be put upon any books whatever. Thus, taking the exchange at 2s. per compus (5) Rupee, a work published in England at 2s. will be sold hereafter at 12½ Rupees 3 As.; one at 1s. for 10 Rs.; one at 10s. for 6 Rs. 6 As., and so on.

So great a change, doubtless, has a serious one, as it regards the interests of Messrs. THACKER and Co.'s establishment, but they rely with confidence upon the general support of the public to bear them harmless. They would particularly call the attention of book owners and of those who obtain their supplies direct from England to this new arrangement, since by its means they will be enabled to make their own selection of sale country from a large stock, instead of transacting to the uncertain taste of an agent at home; and at no greater cost than the sum, which they are now called on to pay, under the various deductions of agency commissions, shipping charges, difference of exchange, &c. &c. Those Gentlemen who propose to support Messrs. THACKER and Co. in their new undertaking, will much oblige them by an acknowledgment of their wishes, since it will be necessary to direct their agents at home materially to increase their supplies; and those who propose in lieu of ordering books from England, to purchase them of Messrs. THACKER and Co., will perhaps kindly intimate the nature and extent of their monthly or annual wants, and the time when they conceive their orders for discontinuance may reach highest, that no disappointment may, by any possibility, be incurred.

Messrs. THACKER and Co. fear, that in consequence of the great trouble involved in the importation of Magazines, as well as from the risk attending it, owing to their value being in so great a measure temporary, they will be unable for the present to make any reduction in their price; yet they willingly pledge themselves to do so, as early a date as possible. The entire stock of books in St. Andrew's Library, will be subject to the same reduction as those already announced, and a Supplement to their recently published Catalogue, will shortly be issued, comprising the large and valuable stock received into this establishment from the Government Press Library, in consequence of Mr. FARREY's removal of his agency from Messrs. A. PEREIRA, LAYNE & Co.

A considerable reduction in the rates of postage here which had effect from the 1st inst. forms another circumstance highly favourable to those who, residing at a distance, may send their orders for books to Calcutta.

In connection with St. Andrew's Library, Mr. THACKER has established a house of Agency in London, at No. 24, New Broad Street, where he will be happy to transact any business entrusted to him by his friends and their connections, with the utmost care, and on the most liberal terms.

PRINTED and published at the SCARLETON Press for the Editors every Thursday morning. Price 2 Rupees monthly, or 20 Rupees a year, if paid in advance.

Subscriptions will be received at Madras, by Messrs. ARNOLD and Co.; at Bombay, by Messrs. LITTLE and Co.; and in London, by Messrs. W. H. ALLEN and Co., of Leadenhall Street.

THE DOORGA POOJA.—The festivities of this Pooja are over, and business has this day recommenced in the metropolis of India. The number of idols manufactured for the occasion in Calcutta alone, has been stated at twelve thousand. The sum expended in the city and its wealthy suburbs, has fallen little short of twenty-five lakhs of Rupees. Of this vast sum of money, which idolatry annually withdraws from the demands of benevolence, it is melancholy to perceive how large a portion has been contributed by Natives of liberal sentiments, who mingle in European society, and are already far in advance of their own superstitious creed. In the rigid orthodox Hindoo, who eats, drinks, thinks and acts only as the Shastras command him, the encouragement of these exhibitions is not matter of surprise. But that they should be upheld by men who openly despise Hindoism, and act at night its injunctions in their daily practice, affords a lamentable proof how little of moral elevation and true dignity of character, even the most advanced Hindoos have as yet acquired. Were we to reason with them, we should be told, and with truth, that they had no belief in the efficacy of idol worship; and that they despised its fooleries, and sighed over the degradation to which superstition had reduced their country; but that they had not the moral courage to relinquish the luxury of popular applause, at whatever sacrifice of consistency it was to be purchased. If they would permit us to address them in the language of affectionate remonstrance, we would urge on them the injurious effects which flow from their example, and the obligation which they are under to endeavour to raise their fellow countrymen, by making a bold stand against this humiliating system. We would ask them to reflect on the permanent good which might be effected, by a due application of the funds they now waste on exhibitions, which only serve to pamper the vitiated taste of their fellow countrymen, and to perpetuate the national degradation. We would ask them to vindicate the superiority which they justly claim among their fellow countrymen, by a united effort to stem the current of popular superstition, and, to suppress these midnight orgies.

Among the signs of the times we notice with unfeigned delight, that the Doorga Pooja Nautches have been less resorted to this year than formerly. We have always been of opinion, that the patronage of such entertainments is a premium on vice, an encouragement of prostitution, and a degradation of the Christian character, inasmuch as the attendance of Europeans is always construed into an approbation of the private character of the prostitutes, who dance before the idol, and a participation in the worship of that incarnation of blood and impurity, the ten-headed Doorga. And we observe with no ordinary feelings of satisfaction, that the Englishman has spoken out on the present occasion with boldness, and denounced these festivities with a warmth of feeling which is truly honourable. He states in his number of Monday last, "that the ceremonies attending the worship of Doorga, are an abomination, and that eternal disgrace would fall on any Christian who should knowingly sanction them with his presence—for once having been informed of their nature, he cannot plead the desire to gratify curiosity as a pretext for witnessing them." Our contemporary, however, appears to us to have written incorrectly, when he says, "that the Native gentry do not consider the presence of Europeans as an approbation of the idolatrous festival." Our experience, based on a long intimacy with the Native character, would lead us to a different conclusion. Though it may serve the turn of the Natives to attempt to regain the attendance of Europeans, by placing the motives for inviting them in the least objectionable point of view, we know that the presence of Christians on these occasions, equally with the Government support of Juggunnath, is east in the teeth of the Missionaries when they attempt to preach a purer faith, as a proof that the worship of idols is grateful both to the English community, and to Government. Our contemporary's illustration of "the Protestant who eats roast turkey and mince pie with the good Catholic on Good Friday, or the Dissenter who hobs and nobs with the Protestant (is not a Dissenter also a Protestant ?) on Good Friday, and partakes of his hot-cross buns," is not happy. Here the cards of invitation expressly request attendance at dances held in honour of an idol. The assembly is held in the family temple. The first object which meets the Christian eye, on entering the apartment, is the hideous personification of vice, claiming the adoration due only to the Eternal God. The festival is indistinguishably identified with the ascription of divine honour to a mould of clay. It is in the presence of this image that the Christian is invited to see prostitutes dance, and it is impossible to interpret his presence into any thing but a "participation in the worship of the blood-loving deity." The Christian may endeavour to quiet his conscience, by the sophistry of "dismissing his motives," but the simple Native, who considers the festival a matter of glory, and not a scene of abomination, puts the natural and obvious meaning on the attendance of Christians, and believes that the image, the scenery and the dances afford as much gratification to them, as they do to him. A Native cannot be expected to attribute higher motives to a European than those which draw himself to the scene.

We are quite as anxious as the Englishman for an amalgamation of the interests of the European and the Native; and for a more free communication between the two classes in private life; and, doubtless, for the same reason, which guides the wishes of our contemporary, for the good it would confer on our Native fellow subjects. But to attain this object, we must adopt congruous and adequate means. We cannot bring ourselves to think, that the occasion of this amalgamation is wisely chosen, when we select a religious festival, which is an acknowledged abomination; nor do we consider the temple of an idol the fittest scene for cementing the union of the two races. We do not see what benefit would accrue to either party, by an attempt to amalgamate them on the ground of their taking a common interest in the dancing of prostitutes before an idol. This would be to degrade the European, without raising the Native character. If it be so desirable to augment the intercourse of Natives with Europeans, other occasions might be selected for the attempt, which would not be liable to the objections which the Englishman has so forcibly urged against the Pooja, when he declares it an "abomination." The Natives might feast their European friends when a child was born to them, or a marriage was celebrated in their families. No objection, on the score of religious prejudices, could be urged against such a measure, by men who have already adopted the anti-Hindoo practice of introducing Beef and Burgundy into their houses on the occasion of their religious solemnities. Such scenes of harmless festivity would do more to strengthen the connection between the two nations, than the invitation of a rabble to gormandise in honour of an idol, with a constabulary force in the back ground to restrain irregularities. We learn that the bulk of those who attended the late Nauteches, consisted of men, to whom a supper from a European confectioner, and a bottle of Champagne obtained gratis, was an object of desire; and, with some unhappy exceptions, such has ordinarily been the class of men who have attended these exhibitions. This, however, is not the mode of amalgamating the Hindoo and the European. The union, to be really beneficial to the Natives, must begin with the upper, and not the lower end of European society. We cannot, therefore, but think, that our contemporary will, upon more mature reflection, coincide in the opinion, that it is no proof of mawkish affectation to exult in the diminished patronage afforded by enlightened Christians to scenes, which he has so justly characterized as an "abomination."

SECOND ANNUAL REPORT OF THE CAMEROONIAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.—The Cameroonians held their Temperance meeting on the 14th September; when the chair was taken by Lieut.-Colonel James, the Patron of the Society, the Report was read, and the assembly was ably addressed by Archdeacon Destry and Dr. Corbyn. We are happy to find that, though the Society has experienced considerable vicissitudes, it has had a gradual addition to its members ever since January last; and they now amount to 8 Officers, 40 Non-commissioned Officers, 177 Privates, 1 Clergyman, 16 Women, and 9 Children—in all 251—and 20 more have been added since the lists were made up. The Report is a well written and exceedingly interesting document. There is a temperate tone in it, which, by contrast with that fierceness for moderation, exhibited by too many of our Temperance Societies, especially of the teetotal persuasion, is peculiarly pleasing. In the Cameroonian Society, there is a class of teetotallers, amounting to 39: and it is said in the Report—"it must be admitted (especially with regard to a Military Temperance Society) that those who belong to this class are less exposed to temptation, than the members whose pledge permits them to indulge, to a limited extent, in the use of fermented liquors." Nevertheless, the Society generally appears to be convinced, that to adopt the extreme pledge for all, would be the surest way to defeat the great object in view: and we think they are right.

The present Report is mild in its spirit and language, but strong in its facts: and herein it sets an example which we shall be glad to see imitated. In the Appendix, there is a letter from the Surgeon of the Regiment, to the Secretary of the Society, which puts together those facts so ably and convincingly, that we shall transfer it entire to our columns. It is a professional contribution of the statistics of health and morals, which ought not to be lost. The official authorities will find it to be highly deserving of their attention.

The sickness and mortality of the European troops cannot be disregarded by Government; for the sicker they die, the greater must be the expense of keeping up the strength of the army by new recruits; and the more inefficient they are through sickness, the greater the numerical strength that must be kept up for the safety of the country. On this ground, therefore, Military Temperance Societies are entitled to the gratitude of Government; and to such countenance as may encourage their members in their praiseworthy course. It will be seen from Dr. Bell's letter, that in 1837, the deaths in the Regiment amounted to 30: of which 10 were the immediate results of dissipation, and 18 more were deaths from protracted disease in dissipated men, and, therefore, either caused or aggravated by intemperance; whilst of the whole 30, only 7 were deaths from disease in sober men. We have seen returns from other European Regiments extremely similar to this, with such variations as that, of about 24 deaths in one year, as many as 5, we think, were violent deaths, caused by the intoxication either of the deceased themselves or their comrades—suicides or homicides from drunkenness. In these facts we have a clear exposition of the detriment to Government, caused by intemperance in the army. How that evil is met by the Temperance Societies appears with equal distinctness from other facts in Dr. Bell's letter. We refer particularly to the Abstract of the Comparative State of Health of the Temperance Societies of Her Majesty's Troops in Bengal, for the first six months of 1838, as drawn up by the Inspector General. By this Abstract it is shown, that whilst of the Temperance Society men only 1 in 164 was admitted into hospital, of the remainder of the troops there was 1 in every 74; hence it is evident that not half so many of the Temperance men, as of the others, have any sickness at all. Again the Abstract shows, respecting the average number of men daily in hospital, that there are only 3. 65 per cent. of the Temperates, but 10. 20 of the rest: whence it is clear that as there are fewer cases of sickness by half amongst the former, so also their ailments are of shorter continuance, and it is to be inferred, of less malignity. Another fact is mentioned in the concluding paragraph of the Surgeon's letter equally impressive. "Of the 126 recruits," he says, "who joined the Cameroonians on the 26th ultimo, eleven are at present in hospital, and of the 216 belonging to other regiments, who landed at the same time, and on the 4th instant, 61 are now in hospital, or 1 in 3½ of the whole number. How is this extraordinary difference to be accounted for? By the simple fact, that of the former number upwards of 40, or one-third, are already members of the Temperance Society, and the whole are probably better looked after than can well be the case with young recruits while absent from their corps—a clearer proof that health depends more upon conduct than upon climate, cannot possibly be imagined." These are conclusive facts, on which it is unnecessary to argue.

Having especial faith in the regard of Government to the pecuniary or economical considerations belonging to matters of humanity and morals, we have placed foremost the facts connected with life and health. It would have been more pleasing still, to have brought out prominently the facts relating to character and morals; and thus to have exhibited the influence of Temperance Societies in refining the mind and social intercourse of the soldiers, improving their habits, nourishing their natural affections, and training them to virtuous and generous sentiments. And the regard of the Public Authorities might further have been conciliated by showing the advantage of having a moralized, instead of a dissipated and degraded army, to which to invite new recruits; and the further advantage of having such an army to command and use. But we must content ourselves with simply directing attention to Dr. Bell's letter, every statement of which is of importance. It will be found under the head of Contemporaneous Selections.

CAPT. POTTINGER.—The last accounts from Herat state that the Mission sent to Shah Kamran, under the direction of Major Todd, had arrived. This once magnificent town was found to be comparatively deserted, in consequence of the desolation inflicted on the surrounding country by the Persian army. The fortifications, moreover, were in so dilapidated a state, that the successful defence of them by Pottinger appeared little short of a miracle. We regret to add, that information has also been received, that Major Todd has assumed the office of British Envoy at the Court of Herat, thus superseding Capt. Pottinger, who had retired in deep disgust at the unworthy treatment to which he had been subjected. Our own letters from Candahar, written at the time when the Mission was despatched, had prepared us for this result. They stated that a series of intrigues had been for some time at work, to wrest this ambitious post from the gallant youth who had earned it by his merit, and that they had at length succeeded in triumphing over the principles of justice and equity. It was decreed that Capt. Pottinger should be removed, and that Major Todd should take charge of his office.

Ignorant as we are of the real springs of action on the present occasion, it would be unjust to condemn the arrangement unconditionally, however much it may wear the appearance of an act of deep ingratitude. Doubtless, explanations will be given, when Parliament demands the correspondence. Meanwhile, we cannot forget that the services of Capt. Pottinger were of so eminent a character, that whatever military honours might have been heaped on him, would have appeared rather inadequate, than excessive. He bravely threw himself into Herat, when it was besieged by a Persian army, marching under the direction of Russia to the banks of the Indus. Without aid or encouragement, by the force of his own military genius, he baffled every attempt to capture it. For months he held that army in check by means so inadequate in themselves, as to add no small lustre to his success; until at length the occupation of Kannah, and the letter of Lord Auckland, combined with the obstinate defence of Herat, induced the Persian monarch to raise the siege. If the town had fallen into the hands of the Persians, the politics, not of Western Asia only, but possibly of Europe, would have received a turn, by no means favourable to our interests; and India would have been placed in unprecipitated jeopardy. The simple investment of this town, eight hundred miles from our own frontier, was felt throughout this empire. The fidelity of our allies, and the allegiance of our subjects, was equally shaken, and Nepal and Burmah prepared to invade the extensive line of our eastern frontier from Simlah to Cape Negrais. The political horizon was covered with clouds, and anxiety sat on every brow. Had Herat fallen, and had the Persian army, with the rabble of Western Asia at its heels, and swelled by the hordes of Affghanistan, appeared on the banks of the Indus, it is impossible to calculate the mischief which would have befallen our provinces, from this stream of barbarian desolation. As every thing is eventually represented in Cash, it is no hyperbole to affirm, that the value of the check which Pottinger gave to the Persian army before Herat, would not be over-estimated at five crores of Rupees. We can all remember the electrical effect produced on all minds, and all interests, by the raising of the siege, and the retirement of the Persian army. The funds rose four per cent.; public confidence in the stability of Government was restored; the designs of faction and treason were instantly fidget up; and our eastern enemies learned from Herat, that the period for invading our provinces with impunity, had not arrived. Above all, Lord Auckland had leisure to extend our line of defence beyond the Indus, to occupy the passes in Affghanistan, through which alone a Western enemy can approach India, and to take effectual steps for baffling any future attempts on our empire from the West. The skill and bravery of the youth, to whom we were indebted for these blessings, were rewarded by the Governor General with the post of Envoy at the Court he had so gallantly defended, and by the applause of Europe. Some adequate reason must, therefore, be given for his being superseded. The people of England who have been so loud in his praise, will require some proof of his general incapacity, sufficient to outweigh the tokens of diplomatic and military talent displayed by him in one of those arduous enterprises which afford the best test of genuine talent, before they exonerate the Government of India from the censure which his removal is calculated to call forth.

THE PENAL CODE.—Our readers may remember that when the intelligence of Mr. Macaulay's election for Edinburgh reached Calcutta, it was stated that he had been closely cross-questioned on the hustings, respecting the Penal Code, which he was said to have successfully defended. In a recent number of the Scottish Pilot, which has reached us, we have a report of the conversation which passed between him and Mr. Russell, a man of shrewd intellect, and of liberal feelings. We have placed it among our extracts. It will be seen that the subject of discussion was that part of the Code which excited so much just apprehension if those who are endeavouring to reclaim the Natives from their unnatural superstitions, and to diffuse the doctrines of the gospel—the only faith which holds out a prospect of temporal annihilation or eternal salvation. Mr. Macaulay, while he states that, if the modification of an expression would remove any doubts that might be entertained, there could be no objection to it, still declares that the clauses were perfectly defensible as they stood, and not likely to lead to any evil. Such, however, is not the opinion of those who are most deeply interested in the execution of its provisions; and the alarm which they have felt is founded upon just grounds. As the clause stands, even with the exceptions which have been introduced into the appendix, a Missionary would certainly be exposed to punishment, while in the peaceful exercise of his ministry, if any Native bigot chose to denounce him to a Magistrate, who might be more favourable to Hinduism than to Christianity. Such officers may, possibly, be rare at the present time; and this is an improvement which calls for our gratitude; but we can remember times and circumstances, in which this provision of the Code would have subjected the Missionary to condign punishment. We have not the slightest doubt of the purity of Mr. Macaulay's motive in the enactment; we believe that he had in his eye those insults which the Hindoos and the Mahomedans have been in the habit of offering to each other, and which have so often led to uproar and bloodshed; but the enactment is of too general a character, and it would require no forced interpretation to bring a Missionary, who might tell the people that a stone could not be God, within the penalty of its provisions. There can be no Missionary so lost to common sense, as to suppose that a wanton insult of the Natives, in reference even to the absurdities of their creed, is the most likely mode of drawing them over to the Christian faith. At the same time, before a Hindoo can become a Christian, his own darling religious feelings must receive a wound, because he must be brought to admit that his idolatrous creed is false, before he can forsake it. The enactment should, therefore, be modified before it passes into law; and such phraseology should be adopted, as might limit the application of it to those cases in the remembrance or anticipation of which it was framed.

EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM OF THE AMERICAN MISSION, CAYENNE.—Native education is still so immature, that every distinct experiment in it deserves attention, and may be expected to afford either instruction or caution. Under this conviction we are happy to have it in our power to give some account of the schools of the American Mission in Ceylon. Their most striking characters are the combination they exhibit of the most elementary education in one system with the more elevated, and the devoted use of education in the conversion of the Heathen. Our information respecting them we derive from a Triennial Report of the American Mission Seminary, at Jaffna, published in January last; for which we are indebted to the kindness of the Rev. H. R. Hobington, Principal of the Seminary, who has visited Bengal for the restoration of his health.

The American Missionaries found their educational system in a circle of Native Free Schools, established in the neighbourhood of their different missionary stations. The pecuniary embarrassments which occurred in America a couple of years ago having materially affected the resources of the Mission, it was found necessary in 1834 to contract the schools. Still, however, they are forty-six in number, and contain nearly an hundred and four scholars, of whom 316 are girls. Their expenses amount to £136-8-4. In 1837, there were 153 schools, and 5,522 scholars, at an expense of £461-9. In these schools, the children are taught to read and write their own language. Some small Native poetical works, of unexceptionable moral tendency, are used as school-books, and European geography and arithmetic are introduced in the Tamil language. The Scriptures and Catechisms are also in daily use; and both scholars and teachers are required to attend Christian worship on Sabbath, and occasionally at other times. The teachers are also trained in Bible classes to greater competency for their work. They are paid according to the progress of the scholars, which is ascertained by a monthly examination.

However elementary these schools may appear to be, they are found to communicate important benefits to the children attending them. They impart slowness and expertness in the management of business. They are raising up a reading population, where few could be seen capable of reading when the Mission was commenced in 1816. They are spreading knowledge, and causing the language of the people to lose its Heathen and acquire a Christian sense. Both in this way, and by familiarising the youthful population with Scripture narrative, they are preparing intelligent hearers of the gospel, who are free from much of the fear and prejudice with which it is generally regarded. Above all, these schools are the nurseries for the higher Seminaries, in which a better education is given, and better opportunity is enjoyed for bringing the gospel to bear on the minds of the pupils.

Next in order are six English Day Schools, established at the chief missionary stations, and containing 265 pupils. They are each superintended by the Missionary of the Station, but are taught by Natives; and the expense of the whole is only about £50. A preparatory school, of much the same character is also taught in immediate connection with the chief Seminary at Jaffna. From these English Schools the most proficient pupils are promoted to the Seminary, on which the care of the Missionaries is principally bestowed.

The Missionaries, from the beginning of their labours in 1816, were sensible of the importance of communicating a higher education than could be given at the Native Free Schools, and of having their pupils brought completely under Christian instruction and influence. It was some time before they could realize their wishes in these respects. At length six boys, whose parents had become acquainted with some of the Missionaries, were intrusted to their care; and from the year 1819 there began to be boarding schools at two of the stations, Tillipally and Batticotta, and afterwards three more at Oodlooville, Panditeripo and Manepy. In 1823, these boys amounted altogether to 120; and the necessity appeared for a Central High School, in which some one of the Missionaries should be wholly devoted to their instruction. It was proposed that the Institution should assume the title and character of a College; but, for what reason we cannot conceive, "unexpected obstacles from the local government prevented its projectors from carrying the plan fully into effect." The Institution, however, was formed, and called the American Mission Seminary, and the same course of study was adopted, which had been designed for the College. It opened with 48 students. It now contains 149; and we are informed that, in the beginning of last month, 83 of the number were church members. The business of the Seminary is conducted by a Principal and a Professor, both from America, with the assistance of two Native Tutors, and six Native Assistant Teachers.

The term of study is six years. Its course has been wisely left rather undefined; since it is only gradually that it can be carried to such a height as is satisfactory to an enlightened mind, and in unison with European education. Indeed, whilst the world itself is making such strides in knowledge, as it does in these days, it is absurd any where to lay down precise and permanent rules respecting the objects and details of education. Whatever is learned, that is valuable, must be taught; and as new subjects of study are introduced, the whole system with which they are combined must be remodelled, so as to assign them a proper place and degree of attention. The progress that has been made in the American Seminary will be best understood by the following statement of the studies of the highest class, in 1838: "Companion to the Bible, English Grammar, Algebra, Nomenclature, Tamil Scriptures, English Language, Natural Theology, Watts on the Mind, Theological Class Book, Robb's History, Cural, Euclid, Trigonometry, Mensuration, Alexander's Evidences of Christianity, Enfield's Philosophy, European and Hindoo Astronomy, Principles of Law, Saveri, English and Tamil Composition." Many branches of this course of study had been entered on years before, whilst the students were in the inferior classes; and, therefore, in this their last year, they were closing the whole range of their education. The class consisted of nineteen students.

It will be observed that in this system great attention is paid, from beginning to end, to the cultivation of the vernacular language. In the elementary schools, it is the sole medium chosen for the communication of knowledge, and no complaint is made of its insufficiency. In the higher part of the course of study, it is still kept in constant use. It is necessary it should be so, in order that by its means a distinct comprehension may be given to the students of the ideas derived from their English reading. At the same time it is cultivated so as to fit them to make use of their unlearned European attainments, in the most creditable and effective manner, amongst their countrymen; and to enable them to compare the errors of its science, with the truths they have been taught from other sources. We have seen no course of study laid down for Native youth that agrees more fully with our own ideas of what is best.

It is as a Christian Institution, designed for the conversion of the students, and, through them, of their countrymen, that the Seminary is most highly valued by its Conductors. In this respect it presents very remarkable features. First we may notice its success. A sufficient indication of that is given in the fact before mentioned, that 83 of the existing students have been baptized, and received into church communion. We believe the great majority of these began their education Heathen. Now they have not only abandoned Heathenism as false, and admitted the truth of the gospel; but according to the judgement of their teachers, they have experienced that change of heart which is essential to salvation. This is a result of surprising interest. Neither is this a new thing in the Seminary. No fewer than sixty-seven of its former students, having been converted themselves, are now laboring for the conversion of others, in the different missions in Ceylon and Southern India, and applying to that object the attainments they have made. Such a statement is enough to make one inquire, whether similar results might not be realized in Bengal. But it is difficult to come to an opinion on the subject.

There is a singular difference between the prejudices of the people here, and those in the South. Here the great object of dread appears to be the change of faith, and loss of caste in that sense. In the South, it is rather the loss of caste in the sense of a social distinction. Here, therefore, in education there seems to be a much stronger opposition to any such connection with Christian teachers as can compromise the religious profession of the student. It appears to us, that to enter such a Seminary as that at Jaffna would, in the estimation of a Bengalee, be tantamount to a formal profession of Christianity. He might as well be baptized at once. But it is evidently not taken so in Ceylon.

The character of the Seminary is thus described in the Report: "Pupils belonging to it have been regularly instructed in the Sacred Scriptures, and have been required to be present at morning and evening prayers, and to attend divine worship on the Sabbath, and other religious services. The practice of idolatrous ceremonies is not allowed in the Institution; neither the teachers nor pupils are permitted to wear the badges of heathenism, nor to be absent for the purpose of observing its rites. Known attendance at places of idolatrous worship is regarded and treated as a misdemeanor." We cannot gather from the Report how the difficult subject of cooking and eating is managed. From the rules, it appears that a definite quantity of rice and curry-stuff is dealt out for each pupil daily; but whether the cooking is done for all by servants, or by each for himself, or whether all eat their meals together, is not mentioned. One thing is certain: the plan is so strict that no brahmin youth has ever yet entered the Seminary. The students are generally respectable Sudras. But in this country the brahmins are so numerous and influential, that it might well be questioned whether it would be wise to introduce a system of education, which necessarily left them unprotected. We are also inclined to question the propriety of such a system of compulsion in the matter of religion as the American Seminary exhibits. Its Conductors, indeed, dispose of the difficulty very summarily. "Some," they say, "might object to this course on the ground of its being an improper interference with the religious liberty of those who enter the Institution. But the Conductors of the Institution do not look upon it in that light. Parents understand beforehand what restrictions will be imposed upon their children, and that it does not comport with the Missionaries' views of the rights of conscience, to tolerate the worship of devils in a Christian Seminary." This is sufficiently dogmatic, but not particularly satisfactory. It may be true that a man has no right to complain of what you make him do with his own consent. Yet it is not so clear that you act either wisely or justly in straining his consent to reluctant concession. In the matter before us, we fear our American Brethren are rearing a religious fabric unsoundly. Their plan, we apprehend, will associate with the profession of Christianity, and even with true piety, a very injurious regard to human authority, and a still more injurious tendency to bigotry and intolerance. Our space will not allow of our farther pursuing the subject at present; but it is one highly worthy of attention.

REDUCTION IN THE PRICE OF BOOKS.—We are happy to perceive that the example set by Messrs. Thacker and Co. of reducing their profits on the sale of Books Fifty Per Cent. has been so closely followed by all the other booksellers in Calcutta. The very next day after the appearance of their advertisement, Messrs. Ostell and Co., and Pittar, Lattey and Co., informed the public, that a similar concession would be made by their establishments to meet the convenience of their supporters. The price of books has thus been generally and permanently reduced throughout this Presidency; and we feel confident that, however great the sacrifice which this arrangement may entail, it will be amply made up by the increasing demand for literature which the reduction will necessarily create. Separated as we are from the sources of improvement in our native land, it is only by a constant attention to the publications of the English press, that we can expect to keep abreast of the age; and the increasing facilities which have now been created for the supply of intellectual nourishment, will not only be appreciated, but improved, by the sales in India.

WEEKLY EPIITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 17.

The Draft of two new Acts appeared in last night's Gazette; the one for authorizing the Court of Magistrates for the Town of Calcutta to execute decrees passed by the Magistrate of the Suburbs; a most useful arrangement as much as at present, through the clashing of jurisdictions, officers are enabled to play a hide and seek game on the borders of the Magistrate's Ditch boundary, and thus to baffle the claims of justice. The other enactment is one of the highest importance, and more affects the interests of the whole Agricultural community, than any Act which has been passed since the new Charter came into operation. It repeals all existing laws for the sale of land for the recovery of arrears of revenue, and establishes a more simple and definite process in their stead. It is to be hoped that a law, in which the Native community is so deeply interested, will be laid before them in their own languages before it is passed; but, considering the supineness of Government in this department of duty, we fear that our desires will not be realized. Letters have been received from Rangoon to the 21st of last month. Every thing was peaceful and tranquil, except Tharwaddee's breast, which was agitated with anxieties arising from a rumor report that the English intended to invade his country, and to replace the old King on the throne. That this will never be the case, is certain; for were the English to declare war with the Usurper, his first step would be to remove the legitimate sovereign out of the way, by a simple process very well known in herbarian Courts.—Jundhpore was taken possession of on the morning of the 29th of September, without bloodshed. The campaign has been brought to a successful termination through the firmness and decision of Col. Sutcliff. Unlucky, while Major Smith and Captain Ludlow were standing on the ramparts, without attendants, waiting the entrance of the 22d Native Infantry, an infuriated Rajpoot advanced to the Major, and fired a matchlock in his face; but it missed fire; the ruffian immediately drew his sword and fell on the officer. Major Smith escaped unhurt, but Capt. Ludlow was wounded, though not severely; he succeeded in despatching his assailant.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 18.

The Mission sent to Labore, to compliment the new Rajah, on the part of Lord Auckland, is now on its way back. The negotiations have been completely successful; not only has Nurpuck Sing allowed the army returning from Cabul a free passage through his country, which the old Lion would scarcely have done, but he has lowered the rate of duties on the merchandise transported on the Indus. This wise measure will lead to the diffusion of commercial articles through Western Asia, and tend to eradicate the predatory habits of its wild tribes.—The fleet of vessels of war collected at Madras roads, is not going to China. The Admiral wisely judges that the presence of a large naval force, without liberty to act, would only exasperate the local government. Of the four vessels, one has gone to Trincomalee; two to Bombay, and a fourth awaits the arrival of the Conway, after which she will sail for New South Wales.—The Supreme Court at Madras has just been the scene of very unseemly bickerings. Mr. Cator, the Registrar, having retired from office, the Chief Justice appointed Mr. Ackworth, an eminent Solicitor, to succeed him; and the appointment was duly announced from the Bench in open Court. The puissé Judge, Sir E. Gambier, strongly protested against the nomination, in which he had not been consulted, and began to outbizz Mr. Ackworth as to his qualifications. A scene more likely to bring the Court itself into contempt, can scarcely be imagined.—The Amherst has arrived from Ak-yah, and brings intelligence that two hundred and fifty vessels had entered the harbour, for the purpose of taking off the produce of the country. She passed many more on their passages, all steering for the same port, which, under the fostering influence of the British Government, has become a flourishing mart.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19.

Our Mails arrived at Bombay in time for the Zenobia Steamer, which started immediately after with packets containing more than 16,000 letters, of which 2,000 constituted the letters of the Calcutta August Mail, which had been left behind by the last vessel.—A correspondence is published in this day's papers, between the public authorities in the district of Cuttack and Mr. Halliday. It appears that no fewer than eleven men have been plundered and murdered on the road between Ganjam and Poree, and it is strongly suspected that the murders have been committed by Thugs. The most active measures have been taken to investigate the case, and to trace out the murderers.—The Bishop of Calcutta yesterday ordained two young men, and then proceeded by land to Chinsurah, from whence he goes on to Kishnagur, where the Steamer, it is supposed, will take His Lordship up.—The Secretary of the Asiatic Society has thrown open the Museum to the inspection of the public during the Holidays, and the privilege has been eagerly embraced. The rooms have been crowded every day. The greatest attraction in the Museum, is the model of the new Nizamut Palace at Mourshedabad, erected by Col. McLeod, one of the most chaste and splendid buildings to be found, not in India only, but in the world. The model has been executed entirely by Native artists. We hear that Col. McLeod intends to take it home with him, and to present it to Her Majesty.—Sir Jasper Nicholls, after having been feasted by the Madras community, embarked for Calcutta on the 6th instant, on the Goleonda.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 21.

The papers of this morning give an instance of the very unwarranted conduct of the Magistrates of Calcutta, in the exercise of the power conferred on them by the late Act. They have effectually defeated its merciful provision, by denying a prisoner liberty to plead through the medium of any one but a barrister or an attorney. Thus the Act is become a dead letter; and the interference of the Legislative Council is imperiously called for.—The question of establishing a Floating Bridge, or a Steam Ferry, on the river opposite Calcutta, has been referred by Government, to three or four of its scientific officers, and if it meet with their approbation, will be immediately set on foot by means of a Joint Stock Company.—It has been confidently stated in the Bombay papers, that two petitions, numerously signed by the Natives of that place, have been sent to the Court of Directors, complaining of the partiality of the Acting Governor, Mr. Farish, in the recent dispute between the Parsees and the Missionaries; and that the Court had reprimanded the Governor. This statement is flatly contradicted by another Bombay paper, which states that only one letter was sent, signed by twelve Parsees and a Mahomedan, and that it was written in a style which formed the best reply to it. No rejoinder has been sent out by the Directors.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 22.

A report was current yesterday in Calcutta, that the Bengal and Bombay forces, which were to return to their respective Presidencies from Cabul, had been ordered to stand fast, in consequence of new difficulties from the West; but the report is not confirmed. The Bengal troops were not to leave Cabul before the 5th of October; the Bombay troops were already on their way home.—Sir Hugh Gough has assumed command of the Madras army, in consequence of the departure of Sir Jasper Nicholls for Calcutta, to assume the post of Commander-in-Chief.—The intelligence from Darjeeling is of a cheering character, and there is every hope that this delightful Sanatorium will be ready for the reception of visitors before the beginning of the next hot season. Upwards of 1,200 loads of rice had been sent to it by Native merchants. A hundred coolies, with a party of Lepelins, had been employed since the 10th of this month in constructing sheds along the whole line of road for Native travellers. Artificers of every description had been engaged at Patna, Rangoon, Berhampore and Calcutta, and were now on their way thither; and a thousand Dangars were expected to reach it by the 6th proximo. Surely this is a better employment for these men than to send them to rot at Demarara.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23.

The papers of this morning give the reply of His Honor, the Deputy Governor, to the Steam Petition. It states that copies of the Memorial have been forwarded to Her Quarters in Leadenhall Street, with the expression of a strong opinion from the local authorities in favour of establishing a Steam Communication with all the Presidencies, either through the Steamers of private companies, or of Government.—The fourth Term of the Supreme Court commenced yesterday. Very little business.—The report which was current in Calcutta that all the troops in Afghanistan had been ordered to remain, is also published in the Lyra Chibbar, received this morning. The report must have come, not from Cabul, but from Simlah, and may, after all, turn out to be true; though there is nothing in the latest accounts from Cabul which points out the necessity of such an arrangement.—The Court of Directors have settled the long-pending dispute between the Vicar Apostolic of Madras, and the old Bishop of St. Thomas, by allowing the claims of the Vicar.—The Parsees of Bombay have presented an address of thanks to Sir Herbert Compton, the late Chief Justice at that Presidency, for the great benefits conferred on the Native community during his administration.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

To the Secretary of the Temperance Society.

SIR,—Having been present at the meeting of the Temperance Society on the 14th instant, it struck me that the opinions stated in your address might be supported by the following extracts from my Medical Report for last year, and which I therefore beg leave to enclose to you. The first quotation has reference to the regulations of the canteen, and the importance of substituting beer instead of spirits.

The object of all these regulations is to prevent, as far as may be, the use of spirits among the men—and the returns will show what success has attended these endeavours. It will be observed that the regiment, during its stay in Fort William, has drunk a comparatively small quantity of spirits, and used, in its stead, chiefly beer and wine. Last year they have underdrawn the quantity of Arrack which they were entitled to, by 2243 gallons, and even deducting from this, the British spirits sold in the canteen, the quantity will still remain 7349 gallons less than they were entitled to draw.

For this gratifying result many reasons may be assigned, and some objections started. First, it may be alleged that the men have access to the neighbouring bazars, and that spirits are easily procured clandestinely in the Fort, both of which statements are to a certain degree correct—yet the great quantity of beer and wine used (of the former 3700 dozen, besides 82 hogsheads of draught beer, and of the latter 136 dozen of Madaira and Port Wine) prove that the quantity of spirits could not have been great.

There is another proof which may be adduced on the subject, which is, the amount annually remitted by the men to their friends at home, or to the Edinburgh Saving's Bank, as shown in the following return.*

Remittances of Soldiers to their Friends and to the Edinburgh Saving's Bank from 1823 to 1838 inclusive.

Years.	Friends.			Saving's Bank.
1823	138	10	4	87	9	9
1824	148	6	8	465	5	1½
1825	103	10	8	243	12	0
1826	104	6	1½	484	2	2
1827	212	8	0	971	7	6
1828	239	0	8	821	0	0
1829	353	3	10	861	15	0
1830	267	12	6	836	0	0
1831	277	16	3	557	9	9
1832	76	3	6	311	15	3
1833	328	17	6	484	7	0

If these sums are considered, together with the above quantity of beer and wine, the wonder seems to be how so much spirits could have been paid for, rather than that the quantity should be so small. It is truly a subject of gratulation to reflect on the enormous mass of moral and physical evil, that has been avoided by such a quantity of spirits having remained underdrawn.

Many an aged parent, or wife or child, or other near relation, has been made glad by such remittances, no less than by the kindness and affection which prompted them, and thus many a soldier continues a respectable member of society, in health of body and peace of mind, who would otherwise have probably fallen a prey to disease, and to still more deplorable mental depravity.

One of the few, if not the only advantage belonging to Fort William as a station for troops, is the facility of procuring at all times a supply of good and cheap beer, and there can be no doubt, that the unprecedented degree of health enjoyed by the regiment during the last two years is in a great degree to be ascribed to this circumstance alone.

* There is another depository in which, during the last four years, the men have lodged money; viz., the Indian Government Saving's Bank. This the doctor has not included, probably because the money deposited there cannot be called so properly and permanently saved as that sent to the Edinburgh Saving's Bank, since it is sent to the Government Saving's Bank that it may be at hand to meet unforeseen exigencies for which it is frequently withdrawn. Yet as it tends in some measure to account for the discrepancy between the savings of the different years, it is proper to mention it. The total of the sums in the doctor's table, including those sent to the Government Saving's Bank, are as follow:

1824	613	11	8½	1835	2	260	0	0	1103	12	6

The regiment marched from Meerut to Ghazepore in 1836, and it arrived in Fort William from Ghazepore in 1827. These movements may very well account for the diminished savings of 1836; while the settling in this place, and the fact that each soldier loses annually Rs. 19 or £2-7-4 by being placed in a half-batta service, will more than account for the smallness of the savings in 1827, and their not equaling former years in 1838, since the difference of batta due to the soldiers of a very weak regiment far exceeds £1000.

* Another reason for the moderate expenditure of ardent spirits is, that the Home Government have ordered all the recruits sent out during the last two years, to be supplied with beer on board of ship, instead of spirits as formerly, and the consequence has been, that a great number of those young men continue to use only beer, and do not take spirits at all.

The Temperance Society, which has existed in the corps for the last two years, is also one of the most important causes of the diminished consumption of ardent spirits; for though a considerable number of the members use neither wine nor beer, yet the greater proportion of them use both in moderation, abstaining only from ardent spirits.

The causes of disease in this station, and in most others in this country, may be ranked in importance according to their scale in the following lists:

- 1st. Intemperance in the use of ardent spirits.
- 2d. The influence of climate by exposure to the heat of the sun, and to the cold of the night.
- 3d. Want of accommodation in barracks and in hospital.
- 4th. Severity of military duties, or military exercises, when injudiciously managed.

A few words on each of these heads will suffice. The first is not only the most important cause of disease in itself, but it brings in its train a combination of all the others, and that, too, under circumstances when the constitution is least able to resist their influences. Dissipation not only injures the constitution by its own debilitating and deleterious effects, but exposes the individual to the heat of the day, and the cold of the night, by wandering about bazars, or by sleeping in the open air, or on damp and cold floors in Coffee Houses or cells, where the men are not always allowed to have their coats. Thus does the drunk, and become exposed at once to the evils of the 1st, 2nd, and 3d heads, and also to the 4th, by the system of drill or extra guards, or duties, that he is obliged to bring up, or be subjected to, by way of punishment. When undergoing this punishment, the best class of men are unwilling to complain, for their motives should be called in question, and are therefore apt to delay, reporting their disease until they can no longer be concealed, when they are often found beyond the power of medical relief.

In reviewing the result of the year 1837, the following was the melancholy account:

The casualties of the year may be divided thus:
1st. Sudden deaths out of hospital, directly from dissipation, .....	4
2d. Deaths in Hospital from ditto ditto, .....	6
3d. Deaths occurring by protracted disease in dissipated men, .....	13
4th. Deaths from disease in sober men, .....	7
	30

It thus appears that only seven out of thirty, were not attributable to dissipation, and of this small number two are mentioned as rather dissipated men.

The Temperance Society of the Camerons was established about two years ago, and though the numbers have fluctuated considerably, yet upon the whole it has been well supported, and there can be no doubt, that its influence has been most favourable both on the health and on the morals of the regiment. In December, 1837, the average monthly strength had been 121, and in December, 1838, it remained 139, having fluctuated in the meantime from 208 to 103. These alterations are to be accounted for in some degree, by the arrival of detachments of invalids and recruits, which generally interrupt, for a time, the steadiness of the corps. The effect in health during 1837 was, that of the Society the per centage of sick amounted to 8 one-fifth, and of the rest of the regiment to 10½. During 1838, the average daily sick of the Society has been 4½ per cent., and of the remainder of the regiment 9 per cent.

These results, however gratifying, do not convey an adequate idea of the benefits of the society; for a number of men, whose constitutions had been ruined by dissipation, became members, and several such remained in hospital nearly the whole year, until they were invalided. The admissions of the last year have been of the society 1 in 25, and of the remainder of the regiment 1 in 11.

This is the first instance I believe of any regiment stationed in Fort William, having established a regular Temperance Society, and it therefore becomes a duty to point out such favourable circumstances in the state of the corps, as may fairly be attributed, more or less, to its influence, in order that others may be induced to seek for the same results by the adoption of similar institutions.

1st. The deaths in the regimental hospital have been in 1837, 26, and in 1838, 22, whereas the average mortality in Fort William, for a period of fourteen years previously, had been seventy-two nearly.

2d. The spirits drank in the canteen have been for 1837, 9,878 gallons less, and for 1838, 8,242 gallons less than the regiment was entitled to draw.

3d. During the above two years, the beer sold in the canteen amounts to 150 hogsheads, 46½ gallons, and the wine to 826 dozen.

This consumption of beer and wine, is not quoted as very creditable or praiseworthy, but as a proof that the use of spirits, in a great degree, was abandoned, even by those who did not choose to be particularly abstemious with regard to their beverages.

4th. The remittances by the men, to their friends at home, and to the Edinburgh Saving's Bank, were for 1837, £387 18s. 6d., and for 1838, £763 4s. 6d.

This is not quoted as a remarkably large sum, being smaller than those of previous years, but as a proof that even on half rate stations, and where the temptations to spend money are numerous, the soldier who can avoid dissipation has both the means and the inclination to provide, to a certain degree, for the future comfort of himself or his friends.

Let it not be said after this, that the British soldier is a thoughtless, selfish, or degraded being—that he is miserable while he has money in his pocket—that hospital stoppages should be increased, or convalescent messes established, for the purpose of spending his balances—that nothing may be left to his own disposal. All such reasoning or rather speculation, for reasoning it is not, is on false grounds, and calculated to do mischief. It is legislating for the bad, at the expense of the good members of Society, and has a tendency to bring all down to the same level.

I have never yet seen a case of distress or of charity, brought fairly before a regiment, that the great majority of the men have not shown that they can think and feel as well as those who have more ample means. Who then would seek to reduce the man to a machine, to deprive him of the power of relieving another's wants, or of providing against his own.

5th. Attention is requested to Appendix No. 13, shewing the messes from the canteen since the arrival of the regiment in India, by which it appears that the consumption of spirits has diminished from the enormous quantity of 10-12 and 14,000 gallons to 2516.

What is the cause of this remarkable change?

It may depend on more causes than one; but there can be no doubt that the chief is the establishment of a Temperance Society, and its principles. I may its principles, because this institution was first attempted in the regiment in 1838, and continued till the end of 1834; and it will be observed that from that period, the diminution commenced and the consumption has ever since been comparatively moderate: and although the Society at that time encountered so much prejudice and obloquy that it was for a time given up, yet the impression made on the minds and habits of many was never obliterated, and many of the former members continued to abstain wholly or nearly so from the use of ardent spirits, and took the first opportunity of enrolling their names in the list of Members on the formation of the present Society.

6th.—There are other circumstances which deserve to be mentioned, such as the decrease of liver complaints from 111, 140, and 185, as in the years 1832-33 and 34, to 82 and to 50, as during the last year; but this may be partly owing to other causes, besides the disuse of ardent spirits, as to change of climate, from the warmer to the colder provinces, &c.; yet a comparison of the tables will shew the great superiority in regard to health in the Cameronian over any other corps, that has ever been stationed in Fort William.

7th.—As Temperance Societies have been formed in most of the Queen's corps serving in Bengal, the following abstract is here added, shewing the result of the whole, from the 1st January to 13th June, 1838, as drawn up by the Inspector General.

In spite of such documents as these, it is painful to hear many crude and vague remarks made by way of objection to the institution of Temperance Societies in the army, as if the mere act of sobriety were a dangerous innovation, as if men could not join together to assist each other in resisting that one vice, the besetting sin of the British soldier in every part of the world, the source of all his misery and all his crimes, without detracting from his character as a soldier, or as a member of society.

It has been alleged that such institutions are anti-social and imply a spirit of sectarianism, which is objectionable in a corps, and such charges have been brought, in all ages, by the worthless part of mankind, against the character of those whose good conduct is regarded as a silent reproach to the vices of others; the sober man is called a miser, and the religious man a hypocrite, by the drunkard and the profane, but surely dissipation and immorality are not therefore to be encouraged.

Again, it is said, why give a pledge not to drink spirits, when they can be obtained from as well without it? But though this may be found to be the case with regard to one individual, it is not generally applicable to those who have been accustomed to drink spirits, and where we can be instrumental by our example in assisting to keep others from temptation without injuring ourselves, it is surely an imperative duty to do so.

The most reasonable objection to Temperance Societies is the difficulty of affording to the soldier any substitute for spirits. His means do not enable him to procure good wine, or even at all times good beer, and it is considered to be very hard that he should have nothing but water to drink, and that not always good.

On this point the assistance of Government is required, and I doubt not that means will be found of procuring good beer, at such a price as to enable a soldier to take a pint of it every day if he chooses, and in the mean time tea and coffee can always be had cheap, and lemonade in the hot weather, and many men remain in excellent and robust health, who drink no fermented liquor of any kind."

For the sake of the recruits who lately joined, I beg to add the following very remarkable facts:

Of the 126 recruits who joined the Cameroonian at the 25th ultimo, eleven are at present in hospital, and of the 216 belonging to other regiments, who landed at the same time, and on the 4th instant, 81 are now in hospital, or 1 in 3½ of the whole number.

How is this extraordinary difference to be accounted for? By the simple fact, that of the former number upwards of 40, or one-third, are already members of the Temperance Society, and the whole are probably better looked after than can well be the case with young recruits while absent from their corps—A clearer proof that health depends more upon conduct than upon climate, cannot possibly be imagined.

I have, &c.

Wm. BULL,

Surgeon, Cameroonian.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

The Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel has published a letter addressed to Viscount Melbourne, on the subject of Church Extension, which, on the ground alike of the Writer's estimable character, and the admirable spirit breathed in the Letter itself, claims our most respectful attention. His proposal is, indeed, a startling, not to say a romantic one; but if, in the 2,000 new churches he wishes to see erected, could but hope to have 2,000 Baptist Noels, men of his spirit, and preaching the same doctrine, we do not say we should consent to his mode of raising the money, but we should sincerely rejoice in the accomplishment of his object.—Pat.

EDUCATION.

EDUCATION FUNDS.—Sir Eardly Willmot rose to say a few words, 27th June, not on the question actually before the House, but on a subject connected with education. The noble lord was no doubt aware, from the Report of the Charity Commissioners, what immense funds applicable to the purposes of education there were, arising out of the foundations of the grammar schools all over England—that in fact there was scarcely a village or town without its endowed grammar school, with extensive foundation, almost wholly useless and unproductive. He would mention the case of a town in the district in which he resided, where the master of the grammar school had salary and emoluments amounting to near £400, per annum; but where, in consequence of its being a grammar school (in accordance with a decision of the Lord Chancellor) Latin only was taught. Instead of this gentleman having a number of pupils from the town he had only one from the town, who stuttered so abominably that nobody could understand him, and two or three sons of neighbouring gentry. In Birmingham, on the other hand, in consequence of an order having been obtained from the Lord Chancellor, enabling the trustees of the grammar school to apply a portion of the funds to the purposes of general education, the whole funds were not devoted to one master, but two or three thousand a year were applied to the payment of numerous masters who instructed the pupils in the different branches of general education. In reference to the general condition of these grammar schools, he would suggest to the noble lord to bring in a bill to enable the trustees to extend the question given in these schools from the present system to a more general one, subject to the fiat of the Lord Chancellor, or any visitors who might be appointed. The result of the introduction of such a measure would be advantageous in the extreme, for instead of gentlemen, as now, receiving large incomes with nothing to do, the means would be afforded for tradesmen's sons to receive their education gratuitously, and for every single scholar now educated from the trust funds, there would be four hundred.

Lord John Russell said that he had in the course of last year been in communication with the Lord Chancellor on this subject, when a bill was before the House of Lords which had been introduced by Lord Brougham. That noble lord had since turned his attention further to the subject, and had prepared another bill, which would in due time receive the consideration of the Lord Chancellor and the House of Peers. In the mean time he could assure the hon. baronet that the subject would not be lost sight of.

Mr. C. Buller said the country was much indebted to the honourable baronet for having called the attention of the House to the fact of such large sums—in an amount almost sufficient for the education of the whole people—being now rendered utterly useless, from their being misapplied. He would state, from the information of a gentleman, one of the charity commissioners, who had gone over three parishes in Lincolnshire, inquiring into the funds given specifically for educational purposes, and the funds given for general charitable purposes, that of the latter, there was frittered away in shillings and half-crowns, in a manner calculated only to encourage pauperism, enough money to provide, in conjunction with the funds specifically devoted to the purpose, for the education of the whole population of the parishes in question. A similar state of things was proved by the enquiries of the commissioners to exist throughout the kingdom, and surely it ought to be one of the first duties of those who had been so strenuous in their opposition to the present vote to turn their attention to the state of these charities, with a view to the funds being applied to the better attainment of the object for which they were originally intended.

Mr. Brotherton said the suggestion of the hon. bart. was very important. In addition to what had already fallen from honourable members on this subject, he could state that there was a grammar school at Manchester, the funds of which amounted to 6,000*l.* a year, but where, up to a late period, there had not been more than 200 scholars, and where, at present, in consequence of some new regulation, there were no more than 300. The funds, if properly applied, were sufficient for the education of a great part of the poor of Manchester.

Mr. T. Eyerton observed that the hon. member had omitted to state the fact, that the funds of the charity in question were not to be confined to the people of Manchester alone, but were indeed for the whole people. The fund had been for many years appropriated, under an order of a Master in Chancery, according to a scheme approved of by the Lord Chancellor, and there were now two schools in accordance with the design of the testator, one a school for classical education, the other a school open to the whole world, and to which any person might send his child. The hon. member was himself in Chancery at this moment in reference to the trusteeship of the charity in question, and it really was rather unfair, while they (the trustees) were acting under the order of a Master in Chancery, that he should come forward and make statements that were contrary to the facts."

Captain Pechell said the hon. member for Salford need not have gone so far north for an instance of the misapplication of charity funds. The hon. member opposite had disputed the facts of the Manchester case; but would he dispute the facts, the villainous facts—of the Great Berkeleyspield case, where, according to the charity commissioners, there were funds to the extent of two or three thousand a year for the purpose of education, but not a single scholar? (Hear.) In fact, there was actually a prohibition to have scholars. All the hon. member for Salford, whose facts were disputed as regarded Manchester, had to do, was to substitute Berkeleyspield for Manchester, and his observations would apply.

Mr. Aldon adverted to the instance of Willoughby, in Lincolnshire, where there was a master to instruct the children, whose son was usher to the school, and who had a fine house and emoluments worth, altogether, 600*l.* a year, but where not a single child belonging to the town or neighbourhood received a particle of education.—Pat.

THE NORTHERN BAPTIST EDUCATION SOCIETY.—The Annual Meeting of this Institution was held on Wednesday, 7th August, at Bradford, Yorkshire, and was numerously attended. The Rev. J. E. Giles, of Leeds, preached the sermon to the students with much power and effect. After the services the business of the Society was transacted. The chair was taken by the president and theological tutor, the Rev. James Asworth, M.A. The Report stated that 23 students had enjoyed the advantages of the College during its past year; that several important improvements had been made in the curriculum; that the income had met the expenditure; and that, on the whole, the Institution never was in a more flourishing state.

The Rev. Moses Saunders having resigned the gratuitous office of secretary, which he had held for nearly thirteen years with honour to himself and advantage to the Institution, a resolution was unanimously passed expressing regret for the loss of his services and thanks for the zeal, disinterestedness, and fidelity which had uniformly, and for so long a period, characterized them. No successor was named at the meeting, so for the present the duties of the office will devolve on the Rev. Thomas Steadman, who had been Mr. Saunders's colleague for some months.—Ibid.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON, SOMERSET-HOUSE.—The examinations for the degree of Doctor of Medicine terminated on the 9th instant. Messrs. Sturges and Taylor, of University College, the candidates who presented themselves, have passed the examinations, and consequently are entitled to the degree of M.D. Both these gentlemen have been placed in the first division. A gold medal for his commentary on the laws in medicine, and also a certificate of special proficiency, have been awarded to Mr. Taylor.—Ibid.

NEW ZEALAND. —Sir R. INGLIS wished to put two questions to the Under Secretary for the Colonies relative to New Zealand. He wished to know what were the intentions of the New Zealand Government relative to the colony of New Zealand generally, and also with respect to the New Zealand Company. Mr. LABOUCHERE said that the Government had come to the determination of taking steps which would probably lead to the establishment of a colony in that country. (Hear, hear.) A num-her of persons had gone out to New Zealand, and in order to protect the aborigines, and for the maintenance of good order among the inhabitants, it was thought fit that measures should be taken to establish law and peace. With regard to the New Zealand Land Companies he need hardly assure the hon. gentleman that these companies could not have been recognised by the Government. They had sent expeditions from this country upon their own responsibility, and without any sanction from the Government; but he was bound to say, with an explicit declaration, that in any future step which the Government might take in reference to New Zealand, they would not consider themselves bound to recognize any title to land set up which might appear to be fraudulent or excessive. (Hear, hear.) He felt it better to give this explanation, because he perceived by the newspapers that some wild schemes were afloat, and if it should be the course of the Government to urge persons to assist in the progress of colonisation in these islands, yet at the same time it was necessary that they should understand that in the case of land acquired from the aborigines—a class quite unable properly to protect their own interests—it was the duty of the Government to protect them, and to see that no title to land should be set up which was either fraudulent or excessive. (Hear, hear.)—Post. June 25.

AMERICAN AFFAIRS.—By the new American ship Memphis, Captain Nichols, which sailed from New York on the 19th ult., and arrived at Liverpool yesterday, we have received New York and Canada papers to the above date inclusive. The money-market was still generally depressed. The rate of Exchange on England stood at 10 per cent. In stocks some business was doing at slightly reduced prices. United States Bank Shares were selling at 21½. The operations in the cotton market had been generally sources of more brisk than of late, there being a fair demand for exportation at slightly advanced prices. The accounts from all quarters describe the crops as most abundant. On the frontier all was tranquil. The intelligence from the Canada is scanty and unimportant. The Toronto Colonist mentions that preparations had been made for holding a public meeting at Coburg, to take into consideration the report of the Earl of Durham. The meeting was prevented by a number of the inhabitants who professed angry opinions. These individuals armed themselves and marched in procession to the assembly, where there interference was the cause of a riot. Several persons were severely hurt, and a son of the Hon. F. Boreell is stated to have received a severe wound in his head. Lieutenant M'Lure had captured Martin Kelly, alias Mills, said to have been concerned in the mail robbery last spring, and in the burning of the Sir Robert Peel. Several persons of yellow hair were reported at Charleston. The packet ship Cambridge, which sailed from New York on the 19th of July, brings intelligence one day later than that by the Memphis. The following is the only additional news:—Sir George Arthur had issued a circular to the Upper Canadian districts, the object of which is the prevention of the usual Orange demonstrations which have hitherto annually taken place.—Post.

SLAVE TRADE.—8th August.—Lord PALMERSTON moved for leave to bring in a bill for the suppression of the slave trade. The noble lord mentioned the failure of the bill on this subject in the House of Lords. He was happy to say proceedings, which had taken place since in the Lords, proved that the failure of the bill was occasioned by want of force. The House of Lords had addressed the Crown to take measures to suppress the crime. The objection which existed in the bill would be removed, and the proceeding stand on the footing the Lords wished to have it. He proposed to bring in a bill which would have a preamble which did not raise any question between the Crown of England and the Crown of Portugal. The House of Lords consequently could not reject the measure, as it would be in conformity with the proceeding they proposed to sanction. The noble lord adverted to the steps he had taken on a former occasion to accomplish the objects he then had in view. It was by misconception and inadvertence that the objection was made to the bill. All he consulted as to the great object in view, preferred the preamble they adopted. It was considered the better course of proceeding to record the grounds on which the power was to be exercised. All being anxious there should be no unnecessary delay, they preferred passing the bill sub silentio. The first ground on which the bill was founded was this:—Portugal was bound by treaty with us to abolish the slave trade. We gave her near half a million to effect the object. Our treaty of 1817 contained articles most stringent. Had she kept the treaty? No: there was no instance in the history of the world in which there had been such flagrant breaches of treaty as she by Portugal in the slave trade. It was owing to the influence of the slave trading faction in Lisbon, that so far from abolishing the slave-trade, her flag had been its main support. Not less than 10,000 Africans were carried annually across the Atlantic from Africa to Brazil by the flag of Portugal. Government after Government had, on the most frivolous pretences, avoided the observance of the treaties. They had refused to make it primary. As soon as we agreed to one proposition—as soon as by some modification we assented to any of their objections—they immediately started another, which exhibited a disposition, which showed a deeply-rooted objection not to make any treaty; and when he had communicated with Parliament, and told them that if Portugal did not consent to fulfil her engagements, that this country must take the matter into their own hands; and on all those occasions it had been suggested that we had not step them more notice they would have yielded. They had hundreds of notices—it was mockery to do more. (Hear, hear.) He did not know that in truth it would be disagreeable to them, although one must acknowledge that the conduct of the Portuguese Government had disquieted them to the esteem of all mankind, he believed that they had been controlled by domestic powers stronger than themselves; and that the nation at large did not participate in the abominable traffic; and that by putting an end to it we should not be doing what would be unacceptable to a portion of the Portuguese people. Portugal had no colonies that required slaves for their cultivation. She was an exporting, and not an importing country, and those ships which sailed under Portuguese colours were not their property, but the property of Spaniards, of Brazilians, of every sort of the earth, and of all rates who carried on this criminal trade for adventure, and in which Portugal had no more interest than Great Britain, therefore, in truth, we were not doing that by Portugal which Portugal had any right to resent. The powers for which he now asked were necessary for the execution of the object in view, and he was sure that the other House of Parliament would concur in the principle of the measure—that it would, indeed, be the glory of the Crown, not take steps that would place the officers of the navy in a situation which would render them liable—if we were compelled to put down the traffic—to be accused of acts which might be deemed piratical. He was satisfied that if the powers for which he asked were given, that we should be enabled to put down the Portuguese slave-trade, and then the great object would be accomplished; and if England would not share the glory that by her efforts and exertions she had succeeded in putting an end to human misery and crime, that deed alone would be sufficient to attach to her an undying fame in the cause of humanity for a lapse of countless ages. (Cheers.)

Dr. LEWISSTON altogether concurred in the sentiments which had been so ably expressed by the noble lord. It was a fact that one seventh of the slaves captured died between the period of capture and of landing. Since the treaty there had been 2,000 ships in the trade under the Portuguese flag, and at various periods since then there were a million slaves, and of all those of whom 120,000 died. (Hear, hear.) In fact, the trade instead of diminishing increased, and he had before him the Shipping Gazette of Rio Janeiro, dated May 31, 1839, which stated that there were 63 Portuguese vessels there at that time, of which he had the best authority for stating there were 39 in the slave trade; and that at a period when Portugal had no Transatlantic possessions. There never had been so gross an infraction of a treaty; it was not only an infraction, but Portugal mocked this country by a pretended abolition of the trade. (Hear.) He considered that the refusal of the former bill in the other House of Parliament arose from misapprehension, for he did not consider that it had contravened the customary course of legislation. (Hear.) The Government also, he considered, adopted a wise course in using specific measures to procure the end to be desired, before they had recourse to any others. (Hear.) It was high time that the infamous traffic should be put an end to, for it was not only a trade carried on by barter, on the coast of Africa, but pirate vessels were fitted out to seize on the smaller slave vessels, thus committing a double robbery. The bill, however, persuaded, therefore, would become the law, when the grounds of it, and the explanation of his noble friend respecting it, became known to the members of the other House of Parliament. (Hear.)

Sir R. H. INGLIS hoped that when the misapprehension under which the other House laboured was removed, the Bill would be unanimously adopted. The tone and arguments of the noble lord opposite in introducing the measure were worthy the great subject of it; and he (Sir R. Inglis) only regretted that the preamble of the former bill could not now be adopted in the present measure. (Hear.) In order, however, to put down the trade, they should not be contented with the parchment on which the bill was written, but should be prepared with a large force to carry out its provisions. (Hear.)—Post.

AMERICAN TRAFFIC IN SLAVES.—The New York papers by the packet-ship Cambridge with dates to the 10th ult., contain, under the head of Havannah, various details, evidently of an authentic character, of the mode and the extent to which American citizens lend themselves to the carrying on and covering the iniquitous traffic in human beings, in open contravention of the spirit of the laws of their own country, if not of their literal expression. The contrivances by which the strict letter of the law is evaded, and the slave of the island of Cuba protected, in fact, by the American flag, and knowingly encouraged by American consular agents, will best be understood by the following extract:—

"Vessel of such tonnage and reputed speed as are necessary for the trade, sailing under United States papers, are purchased here by persons engaged in the slave-trade, and a contract entered into between the seller and purchaser that the vessel shall retain her American papers for a certain time, and security is given by the purchaser that the register, and all the vessel's papers, shall be returned to the proper authorities in the United States within that time. By this contract the purchaser secures the vessel's papers for the voyage to the coast of Africa. The purchaser puts on board here a new crew, and some American citizen as master—no matter who, or of what profession, so that he is a desperate fellow—and he takes the title of flag-captain, without any command whatever, serving only as a protection for the vessel against British cruisers on the coast of Africa, and until the slaves are secured. After this object is attained, the captain in fact, or the person who superintends the expedition, presents a power of attorney for the transfer of the vessel, and takes charge as captain; she is put under the Portuguese flag, and starts for Cuba; and the flag-captain returns in her as a passenger, with his American papers, securing to himself a part of the profits of the voyage for his services, with a full knowledge of the intention of the voyage at the time it was commenced. This is a daily operation here, and a number of vessels within the past month have been despatched in this trade."

Particulars are distinctly given of several ships, the initials of the names only however stated, then clearing or recently cleared in Havannah for this atrocious trade, under the circumstances detailed, and of others sold to the Cubano merchants and cleared for New Orleans, there to procure the necessary papers to protect the "nominal captain" and outward-bound cargo.

It was before known that the American citizens and merchants were more or less indirectly concerned in favouring and participating in the profits of the trade in slaves carried on from the island of Cuba, but the manner in which the system was worked so as to escape the penalties of the laws of their own country has not perhaps been hitherto so well understood or described. As there is a mixed slave-trade commission, and of course resident British commissioners, at Havannah, it is hardly to be supposed that they can be unacquainted with the nature of the facts here stated, or that they have failed to report them to their own Government. The application of a remedy for such nefarious practices must, however, always be difficult, if not impracticable, so long as the United States shall refuse to consent to the reciprocal right of search, without which declaring the slave-trade to be piracy amounts almost to a nullity. If the Government and Congress of the union are really honest in their avowed intentions, it is not easy to understand why they should still refuse to subscribe to the mutual right of search agreed upon between other nations.—Times.

PRESENT RATES OF INTEREST.—It is to be feared that the bill just passed for further relaxing the money laws, by taking away all limit to the discount of long-dated bills, is operating most injuriously to some of the inferior branches of trade, who are compelled to pay a price out of all proportion to the houses of the first class for that accommodation without which they cannot continue their business; and that, unless relieved by some change in the present state of things, much insolvency will be caused by it. Notwithstanding the rise in the value of money, no corresponding advance has yet taken place in the profits of any department of commerce, and it is next to impossible, therefore, that houses of small capital should continue to pay interest at the rate of 10, 15, and even 20 per cent., as many of them are now compelled to do. All the advantages of the measure have gone into the hands of the banks and of the great money-dealers, who can raise capital almost at pleasure, while the great mass of traders are borne down and oppressed by it beyond all the anticipations which could have been formed by the most zealous opponents of it. The subject is viewed by reflecting men in the city with very great uneasiness.—Times & City Article.

LATE BISHOP OF PETERSBURG.—We are authorized to contradict the statement relative to the property left by the late Bishop of Peterborough. His freehold property, which is called very large, did not amount to seven acres; and his personal property, after payment of the necessary charges upon it, will be considerably below 20,000*l.*—Standard.

NATIONAL GALLERY.—By a return recently laid upon the table of the House of Commons, it appears that the number of visitors in each of the last four years was as follows: 1856, 14,827; 1856, 125,747; 1857, 118,537; 1858, 397,648.—Pat.

DEFINITION OF "A CHARIOT."—A witness, lately examined before the Lord Mayor in a case of assault, described the defendant as a Chariot. Mr. Hobler asked her what she meant by a Chariot. She replied, "Indeed, indeed, to confess the truth, I can't tell; only when we hear persons abusing people for not letting them do just what they like, we call them Chariots."—Ibid.

MR. DANIEL AND THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—At Birmingham, on Thursday, the Attorney-General having stepped out of court and immediately returned, the following dialogue occurred:—Mr. Daniel: I have been saying behind the Attorney-General's back what I would not have said if he were present. The Attorney-General: Well, what is that? Mr. Daniel: Why, I said that you were absent.—Courtesy Mercury.

GEORGE IV., when Prince of Wales, was the leader of half the tasteless fashion of his time; but being totally destitute of taste, not having one gentleman-like feeling or sentiment about him, he not only outlived his fashion, but lived to become unfashionable himself, and though aspiring, as his greatest glory, to be thought the first gentleman of the age, is now rightly considered to have been no gentleman at all.—Fraser.

"REAL BRUSSELS."—An auctioneer in a country town, while engaged in his avocation, a few days since, thus exalted the merits of a carpet which he was desirous of selling:—"Gentlemen and ladies, some people are in the habit of selling carpets for Brussels which are not Brussels, but I can most positively assure you that this elegant article was made by Mr. Brussels himself."—Pat.

BRUSSELS, Aug. 6.—The forts of Lillo and Lieffschuck, which have been restored to us by the Dutch, are in very bad condition. The Dutch were obliged to prop up the bridge in order to remove their artillery. The forts were completely armoured. The cavalier of Lieffschuck had 30 pieces of cannon. This cavalier erected in 1814, after the landing of the English, is a formidable position. Fort Lillo being almost directly opposite, their fires cross on the Scheldt. Lieffschuck is surrounded by troops; it is better defended than Lillo; it was erected in 1814. Lillo has a few houses, which have had to be put in order for the custom-house officers. The Dutch did not care to repair buildings which they might expect to abandon some day or other.—Ibid.

THE DUTCH AND BELGIAN TREATY.—On the round table in the hall of the German Diet (says a Frankfurt letter-writer) are to be seen the originals of the new treaties between the kingdoms of the Netherlands and Belgium, with the resolutions of the mediating powers. That which was furnished by the King of the Belgians is the most brilliant. The arms of the new kingdom are emblazoned with all the precision used in modern days in stamping coins. The first signature is that of Queen Victoria, which shows great firmness of character. The copy sent by France is also very splendid, and the profile of the King is eminently well executed. The attestation by Austria is a most beautiful specimen of calligraphy.—Ibid.

CRIMINAL EXPERIMENT BY HANGING.—Dr. Clowse mentions, in the Lancet, the very singular case of a Swiss who underwent the process of hanging 18 times, and yet survived it all. When death at last seized his prey, his body was examined to ascertain the cause of this strange tenacity of life, and it was found that the windpipe was turned to bone—a sufficient cause certainly for his not being suffocated.—Ibid.

STORM IN BELGIUM.—BRUSSELS, Aug. 8.—Yesterday afternoon, between 5 and 6 o'clock, a terrible storm, with hailstones of extraordinary size, burst over the town of Arlon and the environs. Almost every pane of glass broken, entire roofs are blown off, all the standing crops laid waste, and the inhabitants of the country are in despair. The loss cannot yet be estimated. No such storm has occurred in the country within the memory of man. At Vinton the disaster commenced at half-past 4. Some of the hailstones were as large as eggs; they were driven by a most impetuous wind. All the corn, potatoes, and fruit are destroyed. A letter from Hechtel, in Limburg, dated the 8th of August, says—"Yesterday, at half-past 4, during a violent storm, such a quantity of hail fell that all the standing corn in the commune of Hechtel and in the north part of that of Houthalen was destroyed." A letter from Antwerp of the 8th informs us, that the storm of the 7th, which did such damage at Arlon, was equally severe at Antwerp and in the environs. It was, however, about 10 hours afterwards, namely, at 3 in the morning of the 8th. The inhabitants were awake from their sleep by a terrible thunder storm and hail of immense magnitude, from an inch to an inch and a half in diameter, which continued 30 minutes. The damage done in the city and in the surrounding country is immense.—Ibid.

DARMSTADT, July 27.—A courier from St. Petersburg arrived here to-day, with the news that the august parents of the Crown Prince of Russia have with great pleasure approved of his desire to marry our Princess Maria.—Dutch Paper.

MR. MACALEY'S EXPLANATIONS OF THE INDIAN CODE AT EDINBURGH.—MR. RUSSELL asked if he held himself responsible for the Indian penal code?

MR. MACALEY.—Certainly.

MR. RUSSELL asked him to explain that part of the code which enacted that whoever did anything with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of another, whether by sounds, by words, or by gestures, should be punished with fine or imprisonment?

MR. MACALEY said, he believed there was not another provision in the code which was more necessary, or more capable of defence than that. No one could hold in higher estimation the value of religious liberty than he did. But when he spoke of religious liberty, he meant by the words that a man should be at liberty to defend, to practice, and to preach his own religion; not that he was to go about and insult the religion of others. (Hear.) In this country an enactment on the subject would not be necessary, because public feeling was strong enough to repress any outrage. But in India you had crowds of different religions, each burning with rancour and fanaticism against the other; and the empire could not be maintained for a single day, if while every one was left at liberty to follow his own religion, massacres were not taken to prevent any one from giving insult to the religion of others. The meaning of the enactment was this: If a person went to the door of a Mohammedan mosque, and called out that Mohammed was an impostor, that person would have uttered a word with the deliberate intention to wound the religious feelings of others, and he ought to be punished. If, when the Catholic host was passing by, a person was to follow him, he would have uttered a sound for the same purpose, and he ought to be punished. As to gestures, there were several indecent gestures in India, which he need not offend the meeting by describing, expressive of the highest contempt and for such cases as these was the enactment provided; nor did he believe that any provision in the Indian penal code was more defensible. (Hear.)

Mr. RUSSELL read an extract from a periodical published by the Serampore missionaries, expressive of alarm that this enactment would interfere with the preaching of the gospel in India, and he knew that the missionaries of other bodies participated in the same fears.

Mr. MACAULAY said, he had the greatest respect for these reserved gentlemen; but it was not strange that neither they nor Mr. Russell should comprehend the matter. The penal code was a document in which all the parts of it hung together. If the missionaries or Mr. Russell had studied it attentively,—which, indeed, he could not expect either of them to do, as it involved a labour of some months,—they would see the answer to the objection at once. Suppose a native entered into the chapel of a missionary, or suppose he agreed to enter into an agreement with him, that was his own voluntary act; and he must take the chance of having his feelings wounded. Now, there was a chapter in the code, called a chapter of general exceptions, and in that chapter it was stated,—nothing is an offence under this code where a person has given his consent,—expressed or implied,—to suffer pain, or to take the chance of suffering pain; so that the case of the propagation of religion was guarded. The act, however, meant to accuse the missionaries of unfairness. The code was a document, extending to 100 folio pages, every word of which had a bearing upon every other, and he could not expect that the missionaries should have thoroughly mastered it.

Mr. RUSSELL then referred to another clause in the code, which subjected to punishment every person disturbing a place of worship. Now, in such assemblies as the festival of Juggernaut, the place of worship was in the open air, extending to several square miles; and if a Christian missionary attempted to address the people, he would be liable to be punished for disturbing a place of worship.

Mr. MACAULAY said that was certainly not intended by the framers of the code, nor would he understand that such an address would be a disturbance at all. Certainly an address at the outskirts of an assembly would be a disturbance of no slight nature, that the law would take no account of it. But if a missionary were to go to an assembly like that of Juggernaut, and breed a disturbance, by actually interfering with the worship of the people, he thought that he would richly deserve to be punished,—and the more, because he was sure that hundreds of lives would be lost in the riot. (Hear.) The case would be very different if he went and engaged in friendly conversation with those who were willing to listen to him,—in the first place, he doubted if that could be called a disturbance at all; but if it could, it would come under the provision in the general exceptions.

Mr. RUSSELL said these two clauses were considered as affecting the liberty of British subjects, and particularly of Christian ministers in India; and that they put it into the power of the judges to banish them at their discretion.

Mr. MACAULAY said he was willing to leave that to the decision of the meeting after the explanations he had given. The code was not yet passed. If the introduction of a word or two would serve to remove any doubts that might be entertained, there could be no objection. (Hear.)—But his opinion was, that the clauses were perfectly defensible as they stood, and not likely to lead to any evil.—Scottish Pilot.

ALEXANDRIA, July 17.—The Turkish fleet, twenty sail of which, six of the line and 11 frigates, arrived here on the evening of the 14th inst; and on the 15th the Capitan Pacha landed, and was received with every possible honour. The Pacha greeted him most courteously, announcing to meet him in full dress, and saluting him as a friend; their subsequent conference was private. The Capitan Pacha applied for a Nizâm dress, the uniform of Mehemet Ali, which he now wears; the two fleets are now cruising together off the entrance of the Nile. A French steamer from the Admiral came here on Sunday. She brought a vague account of some disturbances in Constantinople, which, however, are not confirmed by the French packet from Syria, arrived last night; and also news that we may shortly expect both the English and French fleets. The Capitan Pacha accuses Kousroff Pacha of having poisoned the Sultan, and states that he (the Capitan Pacha) wrote to Louis Pacha to invite his army to that of Ibrahim, and jointly march upon Constantinople. I am afraid that, under all the outward appearances of peace and contentment, some storm is yet brewing. Mehemet Ali is in the worst of humours, although he has apparently gained all he sought for.

Sir Moses Montefiore arrived here on the 12th instant from Syria—he has made proposals to Mehemet Ali to establish a bank here with a capital of one million sterling, provided he will do away with the many legal disqualifications of the Jews—he here we can form little idea of what the Jews have to complain of—they are as well to do as any of the rest of the population, the greater portion of them having Frank protections; some few are English and French, but the greater part are Austrian or Tuscan subjects. In Syria, however, the Hajdoots have been oppressed of all the subjects of the Pacha—the remains of the "olden time" in all Turkish countries, a time happily passing quickly away before the rapid march of civilisation in this little corner of the globe; for instance, a Jew cannot in Syria be a witness in a court of justice—cannot hold land, and is subject to many other disqualifications too numerous to enumerate. Sir M. Montefiore has already rented a large tract of land in Palestine on a lease for fifty years, and holds out every inducement to his people to become agriculturists in the lands of their forefathers, as one principal object of his banking institution will be rendering the necessary assistance for the prosecution of agricultural pursuits, the real riches of these countries. I fear his scheme is premature, but it may be the small beginning from which a great and long prophesied event may be brought about in its appointed time. A million of capital would not where have greater weight than in these countries. Mr. Montefiore had his first audience from Mehemet Ali in full court dress as a Sheriff of London.—Pat.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE COMMANDER OF THE FORCES.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 7th September, 1890.

With reference to General Orders by the Honourable the President in Council, No. 120, of the 31st of July last, authorizing an additional or supplementary to each regiment of native infantry of the line, the Commander of the Forces, with the sanction of the Right Honourable the Governor General, directs the formation of four recruit depot battalions, to consist of the 8th companies of the underequipped corps, which are at present employed on field service, or situated at stations where recruiting is generally attended with delay and difficulty. All other regiments will complete their units companies in the usual manner, detaching small recruiting parties where it may be deemed necessary; and the Commander of the Forces will continue to effect the object in view, with the utmost expedition, and in the most efficient manner.

The depot battalions will be formed as follows:

Depot Battalions.	To be Stationed at	Corps
First, .....	Juanpore, .....	3d, 15th, 16th, 32d, 36th, 47th, 48th, 76th and 73d regiments.
Second, .....	Fattighur, .....	1st, 11th, 20th, 24th, 25th, 61st, 57th, 58th, and 59th regiments.
Third, .....	Delhi, .....	18th, 19th, 22d, 20th, 29th, 46th, 49th, 53d, 71st, and 74th regiments.
Fourth, .....	Bareilly, .....	2d, 4th, 27th, 31st, 32d, 37th, 43d, 43d, and 43d regiments.

One European officer (to be selected with reference to his qualifications for the duty by Commandant of corps) from each of the named regiments, and the native commissioned officers and drummers, for the 9th company respectively, are to be sent to the several depots, as soon as practicable, for the purpose of being employed in recruiting, establishing discipline, and as drill instructors.

The pay of the recruits is to be drawn on separate muster rolls, and in separate abstracts, one muster roll and one abstract for each company or regiment.

A Commandant and an Adjutant will be nominated to each battalion, on the allowances assigned to corresponding appointments in corps of the line.

The several companies will be commanded by the officers of the corps to which they respectively belong at the depot.

Indents for clothing, arms, and accoutrements, are to be prepared by the officers commanding the depot battalions, by whom also all necessary articles of half mounting required for the recruits, are to be provided, in the manner prescribed by the regulations on that head, and in strict conformity with the pattern in use with the corps to which the men respectively belong.

The same periodical papers and reports are to be forwarded by the officers commanding depots, as are required to be furnished by officers commanding corps of the line.

The following appointments of Commandants and Adjutants are made:

- Major C. Coventry, of the 23d regiment of native infantry, to command.
- 1st depot, .....
- Lieutenant J. Melville, of the 3d regiment of native infantry, to be Adjutant.
- 2d ditto, .....
- Major J. L. Earle, of the 8th regiment of native infantry, to command.
- Lieutenant J. L. Lomer, of the 21st regiment of native infantry, to be Adjutant.
- 3d ditto, .....
- Major W. W. Fowle, of the 21st regiment of native infantry, to command.
- Lieutenant J. Waterfield, of the 38th regiment of native infantry, to be Adjutant.
- 4th ditto, .....
- Major J. D. Evers, of the 19th regiment of native infantry, to command.
- Ensign W. A. J. Mayhew, of the 8th regiment of native infantry, to be Adjutant.

A medical officer, Brevet Major, Quarter Master Sergeant, and Native Doctors, for each depot, will be appointed hereafter.

The Kurnool station order of the 23d ultimo, directing Surgeon C. Reany, of the 4th regiment of light cavalry, to afford medical aid to the prisoners in the Pantnig jail, delivering over the charge of the 21st native infantry to Surgeon W. Duff, of the 24th regiment; and appointing Surgeon B. Bell, of the 60th native infantry, to the medical charge of the depot of Her Majesty's 13th light infantry, is confirmed.

The Bangalore station order of the 23d ultimo, appointing Assistant Surgeon E. W. Kirk, M. D., doing duty with Her Majesty's 40th regiment, to the medical charge of the 3d company 3d battalion of artillery, vice Balfour, who has been directed to proceed to Tirhoot, is confirmed.

Brevet Sergeant George Lindsay is removed from Agra to Dum-Dum, where Evers deceased.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 26th September, 1839.

The Commander of the Forces directs the following appointments: Lieutenant W. B. Lumley, of the 67th regiment of native infantry, to be 3d in Command; and Lieutenant G. Jackson, of the 4th regiment of light cavalry, to be Adjutant to the 3d local horse, in succession to Captain C. O'Hara appointed Commandant.

The undersigned men are transferred to the Town Major's list, and appointed Quarter Master Sergeants to the regiments specified opposite their names:

Sergeant Thomas Roman, of the 4th company 1st battalion of artillery, to the 21st regiment of native infantry, vice Henderson deceased.

Sergeant Alexander Neville, of the 3d company 2d battalion of artillery, to the 20th regiment of native infantry, vice Whelan deceased.

The appointment of Sergeant Thomas Jones, of the 1st company 3d battalion of artillery, to the commissariat department, in General Orders of the 16th July last, is cancelled, that individual having previously been appointed to a situation in the department of public works.

General Sing is appointed Native Doctor, and attached to the 1st troop 3d brigade of horse artillery, from the 31st of July last, vice Mutton transferred to the pension establishment.

The undersigned officers have leave of absence:

33d regiment native infantry.—Brevet Major W. F. Steer, from 20th August to 4th January 1840, to visit Kishanganj and the Presidency, on medical certificate, preparatory to applying for leave to sea.

60th regiment native infantry.—Lieutenant and Adjutant J. H. Chowne from 10th September to 1st December, to visit the Presidency, on private affairs.

Salutem.—The Christian names of Hospital Apprentice Courtney, are

"Robert Michael," and not "Nichols," as specified in several Orders of the 23d ultimo. The order looks to be corrected accordingly.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 11th September, 1839.

The Meerut division order of the 6th instant, appointing Assistant Surgeon J. M. Chayne to the medical charge of the European invalids of Her Majesty's and the Honourable Company's service, about to proceed by water to the Presidency, retaining his present charge of the 19th regiment of native infantry, until the departure of the invalids from Meerut, is confirmed.

The Agra and Muttra district order of the 23d ultimo, directing all reports to be made to Lieutenant Colonel J. Anderson, of the 34th regiment of native infantry, on the departure of Brigadier Field, is, with the sanction of the Right Honourable the Governor General confirmed.

The Havel station order of the 28th ultimo, appointing Lieutenant and Brevet Captain J. H. Haldane to act as second in Command of the Havelnash light infantry, during the period Captain Turner remains in charge of the battalion, is confirmed.

The Dum-Dum station order of the 24th ultimo, appointing Pte Major E. Misset, of the 1st battalion of artillery, to act as Quartermaster, is confirmed as a temporary arrangement.

The suspension awarded to Lieutenant K. W. Elmslie, of the 62d regiment of native infantry, by sentence of the general court martial published in General Orders of the 28th February last, expired on 1st instant, from which date that officer is to be considered as having returned to his duty.

The undersigned officers have leave of absence:

Invalid establishment.—Captain T. Galle, from 10th October to 10th October 1840, to visit Darjeeling and the Presidency, on private affairs.

33d regiment native infantry.—Lieutenant Adjutant and Quarter Master G. P. Salmond, from 15th September to 10th December, to visit Agra, on private affairs.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 19th September, 1839.

The Commander of the Forces desires, that the instructions contained in the Adjutant General's circular, No. 3344, of the 28th March 1839, with annexment of the preceding day's date, relative to the course to be pursued with native deserters, may no longer be considered in force; altered circumstances rendering it now expedient, that soldiers, who may be accused of the crime of desertion, should, on occasions where officers commanding divisions and field forces may consider the measure of bringing them to trial requisite, be arraigned before a general court-martial (instead of the inferior court, which was the above period deemed sufficient) in order that if found guilty, the offender may receive a punishment commensurate with the offence, which under existing regulations, the inferior tribunal is not competent to award.

Captain E. Rush, of the 4th light cavalry, doing duty at the cantonment of Ferozabad, is, at his own request, permitted to proceed and join his regiment.

Brevet Captain Lord H. Gordon, of the 23d regiment of native infantry, is appointed to do duty at the cantonment of Landour, until further orders.

This cancels the unexpired portion of the leave granted to him, in General Orders of the 28th May last.

Coronet and Adjutant E. Harvey will act as 3d in Command to the 3d regiment of local horse, until the arrival of the officer who stands permanently appointed to that situation.

Ensign S. J. Hecker, of the 11th regiment of native infantry, is appointed to officiate as Adjutant to the 2d regiment of local horse, during the time Cornet Harvey may be employed as 3d in Command, or until further orders.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 19th September, 1839.

The Presidency division order of the 1st instant, placing Assistant Surgeon J. W. Frank and Hospital Apprentice A. Glegg, doing duty with Her Majesty's 21st regiment of native infantry (Madras) at the disposal of the officiating Superintending Surgeon at the Presidency, is confirmed.

The Campore division order of the 7th instant, directing magazine Sergeant Isaac Ward, lately removed to the magazine at Delhi, to continue to do duty at Campore, until the 10th proximo, is confirmed.

Corporal Philip Noble, of the 3d company 1st battalion of artillery, is transferred to the Town Major's list, and appointed to the commissariat department, vice Jones, whose appointment has not taken effect.

The undersigned officers have leave of absence:

29th regiment native infantry.—Surgeon T. Forrester, from 20th October to 24th October 1840, to visit the hills north of Deyran, on medical certificate.

33d regiment native infantry.—Ensign T. H. Rhum, from 15th September to 15th March 1840, to proceed on the river, and visit the Presidency, on medical certificate.

By order of the Commander of the Forces,

J. H. LUMLEY, Major General, Adjutant General of the Army.

OFFICIAL SEPARATION FROM IDOLATRY.—It is with no ordinary satisfaction, we direct the attention of our readers to the Draft of an Act for the Examination of Native Witnesses, which will be found in its proper place, amongst the Government Notifications. This enactment will be received with equal gratitude by the Judicial Functionaries of Government, and by the people: and we are confident it will tend greatly to improve the administration of justice, as well as to raise the moral character of the Native population. The cases of our Courts have rendered them odious to respectable men, witnesses of credit would not come there to furnish the truth. Truly, therefore, was the greatest stranger in the place. In proportion, also, as falsehood and perjury were introduced in the room of honest testimony, they sought for themselves security from punishment. In fact, the laws against perjury have been nearly a dead letter. When each party in every suit could marshal as many miscreants as he chose to pay, to swear to any assertion or contradiction whatever; and in every suit both parties, the one in the right as well as he in the wrong, sustained their opposite assertions by the same means, it could but rarely happen that a Judge could, with any satisfaction to his own mind, decide, on which party, or which individual, to fix the charge of perjury. The attempt was, therefore, generally avoided. Now, however, we may expect witnesses of a different class to come into the Courts; and, through their veracity, suborned witnesses will be brought under the punishment they at present escape.

To our Correspondents and others, to whom the administration of heathen oaths has been a subject of anxious interest, we would offer our hearty congratulations, on the regard which Government has shown to their representations. It is not always the easiest thing to do what is the most reasonable. Men are often ready to make great personal sacrifices in doing that which they can have the credit of doing spontaneously; but few like to be publicly argued into a measure; and the least winning of all, perhaps, is the argument of remonstrance and protest. For this reason we think the conduct of Government in the present case, the more worthy of honour and gratitude. They have relieved their Christian servants from what was an offence to their consciences; and at the same time have avoided casting any reproach either on Hindoos or Mahomedans.

Government, however, are occasionally too delicate, or modest, or reserved in doing good. Our Correspondent, a Subscriber, calls our attention to another proceeding of theirs, for freeing the Members of the Service from unfit interference with idolatrous matters; which certainly escaped our observation, although the official notification of it appears at page 697, in our number of the 3rd October last. It is an appointment, under date the 12th September, 1839, expressed in the following terms: "Moulvie Golaub Ruseel, Principal Sudder Ameen, and Baboo Govind Bullab Bose, City Moudaff, are appointed Local Agents in the District of Cuttack, under the provisions of Reg. XIX. of 1810."

The Regulation referred to, was enacted for "the due appropriation of the rents and produce of lands granted for the support of Mosques, Hindoo Temples, Colleges, and other purposes; for the maintenance and repair of Bridges, Serays, Kuttars and other public buildings; and for the custody and disposal of Nuzzool property or escheats." The general superintendence of all these matters is committed, by the Regulation, to the Board of Revenue, and the Board of Commissioners, in their respective limits; and it is enacted, that, subject to their authority, control and orders, local agents shall be appointed by the Governor General in Council, the better to carry into effect the duties entrusted to them. The Collector of the Zillah is ex-officio to be one of those agents, and with him are to be united "such other public officers, whether in the civil, military, or medical branch of the service, as may, from time to time, be judged expedient."

So it appears the Deputy Governor of Bengal, without touching the Regulations, has availed himself of the Native Subordinate Civil Service, in order to save the European Functionaries from the degrading task of watching over the punctual performance of idolatrous worship, and keeping the shrines of heathenism from falling into decay. It is certainly a considerate proceeding, for which thanks are justly due to His Honour. But why should so active an interference, through any agency, be exercised by Government for keeping the strong holds of idolatry unshaken? Would it not be enough that the Courts were open to every one who could show he was wronged, by malversation of the incumbents of any Mosque or Temple? We never heard the English Government at home blamed for its conduct towards the trustees of Dissenting and Roman Catholic Chapels. Yet certainly no public officer is appointed to watch over their execution of the trust committed to them. If they do wrong, they may be prosecuted by any one who has an interest in their doing what is right. And what more is wanted, for the maintenance of even-handed justice to all parties? Why should the secular power be called in, to perpetuate the noxious abominations of idolatry, which, left to themselves, would gradually crumble away to nothing?

THE SCHOOLMASTER, AND THE PHRASEOLOGY OF THE LAST ACT.—The Schoolmaster is still abroad. Instead of accepting the advice, which we ventured to give him, to return to his Native land, to perfect himself in his own craft and mystery, he has been persuaded by a contemporary, to continue in the country, to look after the phraseology of the Legislative Council. The Englishman very facetiously announced, on Wednesday, October the 23d, "that the prospect of business in the Supreme Court, was any thing but cheering in the gentlemen in black," and on the 25th of the same month, furnished his readers with a critique on the wording of the Act, for the examination of Native witnesses. How far it is creditable to the Schoolmaster's knowledge of English law, we will not undertake to judge; but if he intends to remain in the country, and pursue his vocation, he must acquire a better acquaintance with Mohaffil law and practice, to which the present Act exclusively refers.

We are informed, in the first place, that the Act ought to have been constructed on the model of Sec. 35, 9th George IV. chap. 74. Though the objection is not very clearly worked, the Schoolmaster appears to mean, that the Act in providing that, "if any person making such declaration shall be convicted of having wilfully declared any matter or thing, which, if it had been sworn previously to the passing of this Act, would have amounted to wilful perjury." &c., has not gone far enough; and that it ought to have said, in conformity with the Act of Parliament, "which would have amounted to wilful or corrupt perjury." The Schoolmaster has here accidentally misquoted the statute, the words of which are "wilful and corrupt perjury." The statute does not, therefore, contemplate two species of perjury, of which the Indian Act proposes to punish only one; but it is evidently intended to provide that all perjury, to be liable to punishment, must be both wilful and corrupt. We do not think the Schoolmaster will maintain, that according to English law, the epithet corrupt is not used in a very vague sense; or that any thing more is meant "by corrupt perjury" in the statute of 9th George IV., than by the term 'perjury,' in the statute relating to India, 53rd George III. chap. clv. Sec. 122. If there be any doubt about the redundancy of this adjective, let the definitions of perjury given in Birn's Justice, from Coke and Hawkins, in which the word "corrupt" is not used, be referred to. Such redundancy of epithet might do little harm in a statute to be administered by English Courts. But in the Mofussil Courts might not the introduction of the word "corrupt" give rise to the idea, that wilful perjury from revenge, or from any motive that was not peculiarly corrupt, did not fall within the scope of the Act? Such an interpretation of the Act, by which the ends of justice would be, in many instances, defeated, would be encouraged, moreover, by the fact, that in two out of the three codes of the Presidencies, the quality of corruption does not enter into the definitions of perjury. Some of the Bengal Regulations, it is true, use the word corrupt perjury; but in the definitions of perjury given by the Madras Code, Reg. VI. of 1811, Sect. 4; and by the Bombay Code, Reg. XIV. of 1827, Sect. 16, the qualities of falsehood and wilfulness are distinctly specified, but there is no mention whatever of corruption. The fact is, that the word corrupt in the English statute is borrowed from the very ancient form of the English indictment for the offence, which, with other ancient judicial forms, was intended to impress the gaping auditors in the Court with awe and horror. It is in the very same form of indictment, that the allegation is contained, that the offender was "moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil, (which is not, we believe, found in indictments for other offences;)"

Two more objections remain to be noticed. They are, first, that, according to grammatical rule, if the relative be applied to the last antecedent substantive, the Act would make the deponent promise that the "matter before the Court" should be true, and not that his "answer" should be true. Secondly, that the undertaking to speak "without partiality" is not a very exact or concise phrase. Both these alleged defects are imputed to the "ambition" of the "drafter" for "substituting a new phraseology."

It is manifest that a person to whom the phraseology inadvertently upon, appears new, can have little knowledge of the Mofussil Regulations or practice. The words "I will faithfully, and without partiality answer," are the very words of the declaration prescribed by Reg. IV. of 1793 of the Bengal Code, and are daily repeated in the Mofussil Courts. Again, the form of declaration prescribed by Reg. III. of 1802, and in constant use throughout the Madras Presidency, is as follows: "I solemnly affirm and declare, in the presence of Almighty God, that I will true and perfect answer make to all such questions as shall be put to me, touching the matter now before the Court, between the parties A. and D., which shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." It is to be observed, that the part of the Act that relates to the form of oath, is not intended for private reading in the closet, but to be openly pronounced in Court, where the emphasis, combined with the sense, is likely to remove all possible ambiguity; though we should have thought, that the sense and punctuation would have relieved the most unintelligent reader from all difficulty. Were we to criticise the form of oath used in the English Courts, we might suggest several improvements both in its sense and in its language. In particular we should object to the words "so help you God." The word "so" being, in fact, the translation of a Latin word, of which it does not convey the precise meaning. But, in such matters, relating to the spoken terms of solemn proceedings in Courts of Justice, which, from long usage, are well understood, and which derive peculiar energy from numerous associations, we think that our Members of Council would be unwise to make innovations upon trivial grounds. We do not, indeed, hold with that Abbot, who, upon his peculiar mode of pronouncing the word "sumptuous" in his breviary being noticed to him, said, that he would not change his "old sumptuous" for any person's "new sumptuous." But we should be on our guard against persons who, like the man in the Arabian Nights, go about crying "new phrases" for "old ones" until we were convinced that the new ones would stand the test of parsing better, and that there was no other point of view in which the change could be prejudicial. In neither of which respects does it appear that an alteration in the language of our solemn judicial declarations would be expedient.

THE INDIAN REVIEW AND OURSELVES.—It would be an act of unpardonable rudeness were we not to acknowledge the very distinguished notice which Dr. Corry has bestowed on our humble labours, in the last number of his Indian Review, in an article headed,

METROPOLITAN EDITORS
OF THE

WITH REFERENCE TO HIS ARTICLE ON THE ORTHOGRAPHY AND THE PHRASEOLOGY OF THE LATE ACT.

It is, we believe, generally known, that we have united with our contemporaries, in the laudable, and, as it now appears, not altogether hopeless task of reclaiming the Editor of the Indian Review from his grammatical and philological errors. But the duty has been a very unthankful one. The Editor, it is true, distinctly informs us, that "a wise man considers correction a kindness" (vide page 552), but so far from making a grateful return to his correctors, he has turned round upon us, and in a very elaborate article, which evinces any thing but "wisdom," has endeavoured to show that the Editors of the Hurkarah, the Englishman, and the Friend are grammatical dolts, ignorant of the first principles of composition. Notwithstanding the Editor makes an ungrateful a return for the kind hints and well-measured corrections which he has received from the metropolitan press it is some consolation to know, that he has been very sedulously turning them to account, and has been burning the midnight lamp over Lindley Murray, Dr. Johnson and Quintilian. The result of these midnight studies is, happily visible in the article on the Press we now notice; which if it has not received some touches from a kind friend, unquestionably, whatever the Harkara may say to the contrary, the most grammatical, the most consistent, the most elegant composition with which the Editor has honoured the public.

The Editor having, in some measure, reformed his own style, has turned his hand to the reformation of the style and language of his critics. We have come in for a share of his notices, and he has dissected, with critical acumen, and a discriminating judgement, the sentence in which we had alluded to his own transgression. He lays it to our charge, that we are guilty of a ludicrous image, a coarse phrase, and bad spelling. He objects, First, to the inconsistency of our having said in one place, that the Schoolmaster had endeavoured to correct the irregularities of the Monthly Journalist; and, subsequently, that the Schoolmaster's vocation was to teach. The Editor seems to forget that there are some writers, even in the City of Palaces, who cannot be taught, but by correction. Secondly; he is displeased with the words, the Schoolmaster "has turned his hand to the Acts of the Legislative Council." It is a vulgar, mechanical phrase. It lacks dignity. It should read, "turned his attention." But, as we described the Schoolmaster to be a very laughing pedagogue, who had undertaken to teach, while yet he had much to learn, we think, upon correction, that our mechanical phrase was more characteristic, than the intellectual term which the Editor would substitute. Thirdly; upon the phrase, "he has betrayed such hypercriticism in his censures," the Editor remarks, "As the word hypercriticism was used, the words in his censures are errors in the use of hyperboles. But has the Editor so soon forgotten the definition of a hyperbole, which he discovered in his researches? 'A hyperbole is a figure in rhetoric, by which any thing is increased or diminished beyond the exact truth; as he runs faster than lightning.' Fourthly; the Editor is very merry on the use of the word spelt, for spelled. But if he had a more enlarged acquaintance with the best prose writers of the day, he would have discovered that spelt is now so generally employed, that to criticize it is only a token of hypercriticism. The Editor forgets also that he has, in this article, avowed his "detestation of wrangling about words." Even if we had stood alone in the use of the word, the Editor was bound to have put it down as an 'exercise of imagination,' respecting which he tells us he agrees with a distinguished poet, who has affirmed, that "it is dangerous to restrain, by rigid rules, the writings of authors, for then there would be no exercise of imagination." Fifthly; the Editor exults over the mis-spelling of the word sheer. We had written it, as it is ordinarily spelled, but the Printer erroneously placed one of the vowels after the consonant r. The error is typographical, not editorial. Lastly; the Editor very gravely informs us, that sheer ignorance is another error in the use of an hyperbole; and that sheer argument is a lawful term!! He must go back to his studies, and refrain from writing such sheer nonsense in future.

We part with our critical brother in perfect good humour. His criticisms have this pre-eminent advantage, that they leave no sting behind them, and always create a smile. We shall watch, with a friendly anxiety, the progress of his grammatical studies, and we hope he will so rigidly apply the rules he may discover to his own composition, as to relieve others from the task. A critical examination of the writings of others will prove, we have no doubt, a beneficial exercise; but we think the Editor would do well not to publish his criticisms for a year or two, at the least. The public will be sufficiently advertized of the success of his grammatical studies, by the improvement of his own style. Nothing will give us greater pleasure than to be able to draw public attention to the philological reform which may be visible, from time to time, in the pages of the Indian Review. We can assure the Editor, that our remarks on the necessity of the reformation, had no reference to Dr. Corlynn's attacks on the Medical College; we believe the Institution has benefited, rather than suffered, from them. We were anxious, and we are still anxious, to see the Monthly Review, an ornament of our periodical literature, and a successful rival of the far-famed Lancet. If there has been any acerbity in our correction, the Editor's kindness will excuse, in consideration of the purity of our motives, and his "wisdom will, doubtless, consider our corrections a kindness."

CINXA.—Intelligence has been received from China to the 17th of August. The prospect of a restoration of friendly intercourse is now more remote than ever. An affray had occurred between some English sailors, and some Chinese, in which a Chinaman was killed; and although Capt. Elliot and the English had retired from Canton, and were living under the protection of the Portuguese flag at Macao, the Commissioner Lin demanded that some Englishman should be delivered up to be immolated to the manes of the Chinese. Captain Elliot had been instructed by the Ministry, on no account whatever to submit to the degradation of delivering a European into the hands of the Chinese, and he firmly resisted the demand. The Commissioner then proceeded to prohibit all supplies of food to Macao, and to warn the Chinese servants to retire. At the same time, he prepared to approach that place with a large force. Of the Americans who continued to reside at Canton, one individual was represented to be an Englishman, and he narrowly escaped being taken up and sacrificed. He was preserved from death only by the solemn assurances of the American Consul, that he was, bonafide, a citizen of the United States. "In these circumstances, the ladies at Macao had embarked on the vessels lying in the roads, and Captain Elliot, with the European community, was preparing to follow them. All commercial intercourse between the English and the Chinese was, of course, at an end. We learn, moreover, from the present advices, that one of the Clippers which had proceeded to the Eastern Coast to smuggle Opium, escaped, with some difficulty, from the war boats of the Chinese, by slipping her cables, and getting out to sea.

These circumstances serve to show more clearly the spirit which now actuates the Chinese authorities. "The English character is to become an object of contempt. The forcible detention of the British Minister, and the capture of the Opium, which was beyond the reach of the Chinese cruisers, have inflated the Government with an idea of its own superlative power, which it will be difficult to dispel, and which, while it continues to be entertained, must render any attempt at reconciliation, difficult beyond all former example. Though the Chinese have always affected to treat the English as inferiors, there was, till lately, an undefined feeling of respect for them, which rendered explanations comparatively easy. But the case is now altered. The Chinese have proceeded to extremities with impunity; and the haughtiness of their demeanour, and the injustice of their demands, have risen with their success. It must be manifest, that no intercourse can be carried on upon the terms which the Chinese now impose, in the pride of victory. Until a respect for the English character can be created, or restored, it would not be worth while to revive the trade. If we open communications again with Canton, on the principle of absolute submission to Chinese insolence, that insolence will only be augmented, till we have drained to the dregs the bitter cup of degradation. Every occasion, however trivial, will be seized to increase our mortification; the trade will be liable to constant interruption, our Minister to perpetual insult, and the merchant to confiscation and death. Moderation is not a natural virtue in China; but it may be inculcated and enforced. Matters have now reached a crisis, at which it has become necessary to give our trade the same advantages from our political influence, which protect it from violation in every other country. A demonstration of British power is now become necessary to re-establish our commercial relationship on a solid and permanent basis. We have to demand reparation for injuries and insults, which, if offered by any power in Europe or America, would have led to an instant declaration of war. Our demands may be easily supported by the blockade of Canton, and reprisals on the vast and important coasting trade of China. But to give our armed interference a character of justice, it will be indispensably necessary that the British Government should be divested of all appearance of being connected with Opium. We must not appear in our imperial character, to vindicate and sustain a traffic, which is contrary to the laws, and detrimental to the finances and morals of the empire. Just, but decisive measures, must be pursued without delay. England has not a year's tea in store; the approaching season must pass over without furnishing a supply; and the Exchequer will suffer embarrassment to the extent of three millions and a half sterling, the annual duty on tea. Every moment is now precious. The Clippers which have recently left the port of Calcutta, fully armed and manned, to force the drug on the country, at the cannon's mouth, will soon render the eastern coast a scene of carnage, and increase a hundredfold the difficulties of reconciliation.

THE ACT FOR AMENDING THE PRESENT RULES FOR THE SALE OF LAND FOR ARREARS OF REVENUE.—The radical defects of the existing rules for the sale of land, for arrears of revenue, have long engaged the attention of the public authorities. They have been abundantly proved by the fact, that estates in provinces richly endowed with the gifts of nature, filled with an active and industrious agricultural population, and blessed with large capital, have, on many occasions, lapsed into the hands of Government, because no one could be found to offer, for the entire estate, the value of a year's rent. The general depreciation of property throughout these provinces, so clearly manifested by the result of the public sales, is to be traced up to our own mismanagement; and it, therefore, becomes imperative on Government to sift this question to the bottom, and to devise some plan which shall raise the value of land, encourage the application of capital to the purchase and improvement of it, and give a firmer character to the public revenue. The present Act has been passed with this object; and although subsidiary enactments will be required to render it a complete remedy for the disorders which have crept into our fiscal system, no man, who has any acquaintance with the state of the country, will hesitate to pronounce it a vast improvement on the existing laws. We propose to offer a running commentary upon some of its provisions; and we trust that the general importance of the subject, involving as it does the interests of the entire agricultural community, will be accepted as an excuse for our unusual prolixity.

The abolition provided for in Section II. of all demand for penalty and interest, when estates fell into arrears, is a boon to the landholders, which will be duly appreciated. The demand was at the rate of twenty-five per cent., or a fourth of the rent; the parliament expedited the crime.

Section III. abolishes the present rules for monthly sales, and leaves it to the Board of Revenue to fix the periods.

If we mistake not, the original Draft of the Act provided for four sales in the year; and we are almost inclined to think, that it would have been better to have appointed fixed, than fluctuating intervals.

Section IV. provides that no estate shall be sold, till after fifteen days notification. Fifteen days appear too limited a period, and will occasion much inconvenience to the landholder, and occasionally entail an act of injustice. The old rules allowed thirty days, and it is difficult to imagine any adequate reason for curtailing the period.

Section IX. passes an enactment which has long been required. It provides, that whenever there may be no bidders for an estate, the Collector, instead of proceeding to advertise it again for sale, shall let it out in farm for a definite period. This will meet a hardship often complained of by the purchasers of joint estates, and more especially by the holders of under-tenures, that they were exposed to loss, and often to ruin, by the extravagance or villany of the managing owner. The present enactment will save their estates and tenures, as the farmer will be entitled to collect only from those of whom the defaulting Zemindar received rent. Such, at least, we understand to be the intention of the rule. It is not, however, sufficiently explicit in guarding their interests. We think there should be a distinct proviso, ordaining the farmer should not be at liberty to annihilate under-tenures. It is also worthy of consideration, whether a rule, so advantageous in itself, might not be extended to cases in which the bidding should not equal the arrears; and whether it would not be more just to limit the farming to the interest of the defaulting Zemindar, and not to extend it to the interests of those co-purchasers, who have faithfully paid up their revenues.

Section XII. and XIII. contain a novel, but very necessary and useful enactment. It directs the Collector to receive, before the day of sale, any amount of the arrears due from any person not being the recorded proprietor of the estate, who may tender it, and to pass this amount to the credit of the estate, granting the payer a receipt; which receipt is to be at once acknowledged in any Court of Justice. By this arrangement, a mortgagee is enabled to save the estate on which he has advanced money, from sale, and thus to defeat the villany, or to provide a remedy against the laches of any Zemindar, who, after having mortgaged his estate, may neglect to pay up the public revenue, and thus expose the estate to a sale for arrears, which would at once cancel the lien of the mortgagee upon it.

Section XXI. is, perhaps, one of the wisest and most efficient rules in the Act. It directs, that whenever an estate is notified for sale, the Collector shall affix a proclamation in various places, forbidding the Ryots to pay rent to the defaulting proprietor, from the date of the notification to the time when the Collector may publicly announce the name of the purchaser, on pain of not being entitled to credit with the purchaser for the rents thus paid. It has been too often the case that Zemindars, who felt certain of being unable to save their estates, have employed the interval between the notification and the actual sale, in screening the last farthing, by all means, fair or foul, from the poor tenants; who thus passed fix a state of absolute depletion into the hands of their new landlord. This will be effectually prevented by the present Act. But, even in cases in which the Zemindar intends or hopes to pay up the rent at the eleventh hour, the fear of such a proclamation, releasing his Ryots for a period, however brief, from all obligation to him, will do more than any thing to secure his punctuality. A Zemindar will borrow, to the utmost limit of his credit, to over such a catastrophe. By this notification, all the relations between him and his Ryots is suspended; and though he may get the interdict taken off in fifteen or twenty days, his collections will long continue to feel the interruption; and he will find it difficult so far to recover his position, as to be able to make good the succeeding payment. The revul of this proclamation, by which he is to be restored to his right over the country, will, moreover, be subject to all the delay and expense which attend the transaction of business in Collector's Offices; and the Ryots, always glad of an opportunity for withholding payment, will lend a very incredulous ear to any notice of the withdrawal of the proclamation. These inconveniences will, probably, lead to a more exact provision for paying up the periodical instalments, than the Zemindars have hitherto thought necessary. But to render it effectual, it is indispensable that the notification to the Ryots, and the notification of sale, should be simultaneous. We would even recommend their being published on the same paper.

Section XXII allows only ten days for an appeal against a sale. This is a harsh measure. Many causes may arise to prevent the possibility of an appeal within this period. The fiscal time of Government is not so precious, but that thirty days might be allowed, especially as a more limited period might lead to injustice.

Sections XXVII and XXVIII refer to the finality of the sale; and as the uncertainty of the confirmation of sales has hitherto been one of the main causes of the want of purchasers, we looked with some anxiety for the provisions of the new Act; but are sorry to perceive that they leave the matter nearly where it stood. Section XXVII provides, that the confirmation of the Commissioner shall be final; but the preceding Section nullifies this benefit, by ordaining that Government may, within one twelvemonth, annul the sale, on the recommendation of the Board, in cases of excessive harshness and injustice. Now we question whether any Zemindar was ever sold up, without deeming his case one of extreme harshness and unparalleled injustice. The Board will, therefore, be deluged with petitions, and its table will grow under a mass of injustice, such as few Boards have ever heard of; and no purchaser will consider himself sure, till one twelvemonth has elapsed after the sale. This uncertainty cannot fail to deteriorate the value of estates. But to make the finality of the sale still more uncertain, the defaulting proprietor, after the sale has been confirmed by the Commissioner, may appeal to a Civil Court of Justice to revise the sale, and the Civil Court may do so. So that the sales which Section XXVIII says shall be final and conclusive after the Commissioner's confirmation, may be reversed, first, by the Local Government; and, secondly, by the Courts, and the purchaser has thus two chances to one against his ever obtaining a final and conclusive possession of the estate. We think that good policy would dictate the removal of one of the chances against the unfortunate purchaser; and that as the Natives do consider themselves, whether right or wrong we do not say, as having something like a prescriptive right to contest the sale in a Court of Justice, and as any attempt to prevent their thus squandering their money, would, probably, be considered a grievance, it would be advisable to omit Section XXVIII altogether, and to make the confirmation of the Commissioner final, unless the Civil Courts should destroy its finality.

Section XXX is admirable. It obliges the Collector immediately to register and proclaim the name of the purchaser. A provision somewhat similar existed before, but the registry was left optional with the purchaser; and there were often weighty reasons against the registry on his part, and interested motives for delaying it on the part of the Native Officers. This source of gain is now dried up; the registry is compulsory, and the Mulajims will be secured from loss, by knowing exactly who are the recorded proprietors of the estate.

Section XXXV refers to the very knotty question of giving possession; and it is certainly a vast improvement upon the law of 1823, which directed the Courts of Justice to put the purchaser into possession, when the Collector was unable to do so; but neutralized this rule, by providing, that whenever obstacles were experienced in giving possession by the opposition of the former proprietors, the Governor General in Council should depute a Covenanted Civil Servant to settle the matter. This was, in fact, nothing more nor less, than encouraging the former proprietors to become refractory. The issuing of a Commission is swept away by the new law, as well as the application to the Civil Court; and the Collector is ordered to do the business out of hand; and he is, for this purpose, vested with all the authority of a Civil Court. Still, however, the mode of giving possession is undefined; and possession is, after all, nine-tenths of the business. But we grow tedious, and must hasten on. On some future occasion we will return to the question of giving possession.

By Section XXXVI the purchaser may enhance the rents of all under-tenures, except (Class three) the Khool Kash or Kulwance Ryots. Government has always been tender of the rights of these resident cultivators; and there is reason to believe, that they have no right of proprietary in the lands, prior to that of the Corvallis Zemindars. But something more definite is necessary to protect them, than the present enactment. Few have potas, or scripps, or documents; fires, floods, white ants and time have destroyed them, if they ever had any; and we have known instances, in which these ancient, prescriptive, hereditary, resident cultivators have been unreasonably ousted for want of them. Proof that they have held their lands at an invariable rent, since the Decennial Settlement, should be received as evidence of their tenure.

The fifth clause of this Section, which protects "farms granted in good faith by a former proprietor, for terms not exceeding twenty years," from being cancelled by the purchaser, is, on many grounds, objectionable. It seems anomalous that a purchaser, who is at liberty to annihilate hereditary under-tenures, for which the under-tenant has paid largely to the Zemindar, should yet not be at liberty to cancel a temporary farm. It would be easy for a Zemindar to parcel the whole of his estate, even in good faith, among his own relatives, for a period of twenty years; and the purchaser would thus find his hands at once tied up. As farms cannot be cancelled by this law, it will follow, that the system of farming will be oftener resorted to; and much as a hereditary under-tenant may be detested as an incubus on the peasant, it must be acknowledged, that a farmer is likely to be a still greater burden.

Section XXXIX enacts, that the claims of purchasers to eject from tenures, shall be adjudicated only in the Civil Courts. What, then, is the value of the possession which the Collector is ordered to give, if the under-tenants may refuse to give up their tenures, and may, in every case, oblige the purchaser to institute a civil suit against them? The possibility of a man's having forty, fifty or a hundred suits to quarry through the tedious process of a Civil Court, before he can obtain the possession which the Collector was ordered to give him, must necessarily deter purchasers, and deteriorate the value of estates. And this clause appears to call for reconsideration, not only on this ground, but also because it is eminently deficient in not stating whether the suits are to be legal or summary. We think Section

XXXIV sufficiently protects the under-tenant, and that the enactment we have just noticed, throws an unnecessary obstacle in the purchaser's way, and makes the value of his purchase very precarious.

THE PRINTING OF THE SCRIPTURES.—Our readers will have observed, that, the patent of the Queen's Printers in Scotland having expired, some difficulty has been experienced by Government, in the attempt to please all parties by a new arrangement for printing the Scriptures by authority. All seem to have been agreed, that it was time the privilege of the Patent Printers should cease. It was a grievance no longer to be endured, that even gratuitous donations of the Scriptures, printed in England, could not be sent to Scotland, either by the Bible Society, or by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. The Patent Printers had power to prevent it, and they chose to put in force their power. It is, however, due to them to remember, that they were not the first thus to put a restraint upon the streams of divine knowledge. Some twenty years ago, the Scottish Patent Printers published several very beautiful editions of the Bible; which, finding their way into England, alarmed the English Universities and Patent Printers, as interfering with the profits of their monopoly. They united, therefore, as their privileges enabled them to do, in excluding the Scottish Bibles from England. It was in a natural retaliation for this, that the Scottish Patentees determined to stand upon their privileges also at home. Their conduct can scarcely be wondered at: but it has very properly brought their privileges to an end. The English Printers ought now to be dealt with by the same rule.

But unrestrained freedom in printing the Bible has not been substituted for the patent monopoly. A Board, it seems, is to be appointed for the supervision of Bible printing; although any one, sanctioned by the religious body to which he belongs, may demand permission of them to print. The new system is manifestly less objectionable than the old: yet both the old and new are unequalled, for, and useless. Is there really any danger of corrupt editions of the authorized version being published, even if no authority were used in the matter? We think not. We may trust to the prudence of publishers to prevent their issuing works which are not likely to sell: and no Bibles will sell but such as are good and accurate. The only buyers, who can be depended upon, for taking off an edition of the Scriptures, are those who regard the inspired volume with religious reverence: and the slightest suspicion getting abroad amongst them of the faultiness of an edition of the Bible, would stop its sale instantly. In the present state of parties, too, it is impossible that faults should not be quickly detected, and brought to light.

We consider the new way of keeping the text of the Scriptures faithful to the authorized standard, only another proof of the inveteracy of English prejudices and habits. Yet the old habit has been modified; and we trust the prejudice has been weakened. We are led now to ask, whether we are never to hope for any improvement, in the standard itself, to which so much pains is taken to confine the Christian people of Great Britain. It is curious to compare the rapid succession of translations and revisions of the English Bible up to the time of King James' Translators in 1611, with its fixed, stereotyped sort of form for the two centuries and a quarter that have passed away since then. In the early period we observe the newly awakened minds of men eager to possess all the fulness and sweetness of the sacred word, and, therefore, resorting again and again to the original text, to be sure they mistook nothing, and lost nothing. In the latter period we have rather the sternness of authority in pressing inquiry and discussion, under pretence of zeal for the purity of Christian doctrine, and the peace of the church. The former was a healthy, and the latter is a morbid state. We should, therefore, have reason for congratulation, were the pulse of the church quickened, by a return to progressive amendment in the English translation of the Bible, instead of the present sleepy contentment with inaccuracy. That the English Bible, with all its excellencies, is disfigured and impaired by innumerable inaccuracies, cannot be denied; and why they should be allowed to remain, it would be hard to say. Our Bible requires nothing but correcting. To supersede it by a radically new version would be madness. The unadorned simplicity of its style, so true to the character of the original, is an excellence which cannot be parted with on any consideration; and we should despair of finding it in a new and completely modernized translation. Besides, it would be doing violence to some of the strongest and dearest associations of pious people, to take from them the long loved and expressive phraseology of their Bible; and no good purpose would be served by it. Indeed, we believe such a course would be deeply injurious to English literature generally. The nervous, masculine simplicity of the English Bible, from which the better part of the nation draw both their taste and moral principle, has preserved the character for sense and judgement, which English writing generally enjoys. Let the great model of our Bible be once taken from us, and we should too probably become weak, and affected as others.

Our Bibles ought, however, to be corrected. But who shall do it? The time is gone by for amending our English Bible, and imposing the new production on the nation by authority. The Hierarchy and the Universities of the Church of England, even with the Sovereign to head them, can no longer enjoy the gratification of dictating what version of the Scriptures shall be read by the nation: but they might easily gain the far better gratification of executing a revision of the English Bible, which, by its sound learning, its old English purity, and its devout respect for the original, might command the universal suffrage of the people, and endure to them its authors. A free will offering of this sort would go far to allay the irritation created by other measures of their choice.

But there is no reason why such a service should remain unperformed, because the Church of England will not undertake it. Now that the Congregationalists and Baptists, by their respective Unions, are learning to act in general concert, to what more useful object could they direct their combined efforts, than a revision of the English Bible, for the use of so many of their churches as might choose to adopt it? Between them, or each denomination by themselves, they would find no difficulty in naming a Committee of revision, perfectly competent for the task, by the possession of every endowment, intellectual and moral, that it requires. The Church of Scotland would be well employed, in the same work. The General Assembly has long had a Committee for improving the metrical version of the Psalms; and certainly with equal propriety might they appoint one for improving the Translation of the Bible. The new task would be easier by far than the other, as its execution would not be interfered with by the caprices of poetic taste, temperament or heterodoxy. The Scottish Secession Church could not do better than address themselves also to the work. They are as able, as the other bodies we have mentioned, to furnish the necessary learning; and there is a sober, rather antiquated sort of piety prevalent with them, on which we should be disposed to place great reliance for conformity in their revision with the beautiful simplicity of the Translation as it now stands.

It would be a noble spectacle, to see all these religious bodies simultaneously undertaking a service so important to the interests of our common faith: each bringing out a separate amended edition of the Bible, as it were, experimentally, and then with mutual respect sitting down still further to improve their work, by comparison with the productions of the others; and, finally, either concurring in the adoption of a single work perfected by the labours of all, or retaining for themselves a distinct version of their own, on the perfecting of which, however, all the learning and piety of the age might justly be said to have been brought to bear. No man can doubt that the cause of true religion would be greatly advanced by efforts such as these. Besides their direct use in eliciting more of the power of divine truth, they could not fail to have just such a healing influence on the party animosities of Christians, as the Bible Society has exercised. In the translation of the Scriptures, as in their distribution, all true Christians would find they had little occasion of difference, but very much for mutual sympathy and respect.

THE KURNOWL CONSPIRACY.—The capture of Kurnowl has brought to light a conspiracy against the British Government, which may well fill the mind with astonishment. Kurnowl is a State, under the Madras Presidency, of small dimensions and limited revenues; the only remaining independent Mahomedan principality in the south. Of the nature of the differences which arose between the Rajah and the British Government, we have no intimation from the public prints: but they appeared to require the military expedition, which was sent to bring the Chief to reason. It would seem from hints thrown out in the Madras papers, that Lord Elphinstone was aware that treasonable preparations had been made in the bosom of the State, which called for immediate interference. The British troops were sent: the Fort was occupied without opposition, and presented nothing beyond the ordinary means of defence. Upon more minute investigation, however, the Zenana, or female apartments, were found to contain between four and five hundred pieces of ordnance, chiefly of brass; some concealed under ground; others immured in walled up chambers, together with whatever was necessary for the most extensive military operations. One hundred pieces of ordnance were mounted, and ready for action; some of them had been cast in forms of surpassing beauty and exactness. The Zenana likewise contained many furnaces, some of which had been recently worked.

All these military preparations, so far beyond the resources of this petty State, and the intellect of its Chief, manifest unequivocally a wide spread conspiracy to annihilate the British authority in the South. In the silence and secrecy of the Zenana, shielded from intrusion by the inviolability of its character, have the dark designs of this combination been carried forward. The caution, according to the description given, must have been cast under European superintendence. The expenses of these warlike preparations must have been furnished by more powerful agents; the contrivance and execution of this vast plan, in impenetrable obscurity, though under the very eye of Government, must have been managed by wiser heads and deeper politicians than the foolish Rajah who is now a prisoner in his own troops, through having allowed their allowances to run into arrears. It is for Government to unravel the ruminations, and to trace the origin of a plot, which would, probably, have been consummated as soon as the Madras Presidency had been deprived of its strength, by the despatch of an army to the Burmese Empire.

CAPTAIN POTTINGER.—The Harbuz states, on the authority of letters from Herat, that Capt. Pottinger being desirous of visiting Hindoostan, had, of his own accord, retired from his post of Envoy at the Court of Shah Kamran. We shall be most happy to find this report substantiated. We owe it, however, to our own character to state distinctly, that we received information from the Camp before Candahar, on the occasion of Major Todd's departure, that he was sent to displace Capt. Pottinger. We refrained from alluding to the circumstance at the time, knowing that on the Major's arrival at Herat, the assertion would be either corroborated or contradicted. When we found a full corroboration of the fact in the Mofussil papers, we thought the time had arrived for bringing the transaction to light. Time will shew whether Capt. Pottinger's retirement has been voluntary or compulsory.

The Atchute has been burnt at Bombay, though not destroyed. Her machinery escaped the conflagration, and it is said that six months will be sufficient for all repairs. Thus, during the most favourable season of the year, the cause of steam communication between England and India has been deprived of one of its most efficient vessels, and our sea steamers have been reduced from five to three. Next week we propose to examine the remarks of the Bombay papers on the subject of our complaints.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24.

The Draft of an Act, abolishing oaths throughout the Bengal Presidency, except in Her Majesty's Court, was published in last evening's Official Gazette.—An active canvass is now in progress, for the office of Deputy Secretary to the Bengal Bank, vacant by the death of Mr. Henderson. Mr. Hampton was announced, in the Englishman, as his probable successor, but strenuous effort is made in the papers to secure it for some one who has been familiar with the business of the office.—The Western papers have published the case of Deputy Provost Marshall Parry, who was appointed by Brigadier Roberts, to prevent plundering, on the capture of Ghizul. In the exercise of his duty, he took up a Native official, caught in the act of pilfering, and inflicted chastisement upon him; for this act of obedience to his superiors, he has been publicly and most unjustly degraded, and the appeal on his behalf, by his own officer, whose commands he obeyed, has been treated by Sir John Keane with silent contempt.—The Secondary School, in connection with the Medical College, will open in the beginning of next month. Its management is to be entrusted to three Natives of whom Seeb Chunder Kurum'ar, who delivered lectures on Chemistry, during Dr. O'Shaughnessy's absence, is to be the head.—The Court of Directors have acknowledged Dr. O'Connor, the Vicar Apostolic of Madras, as possessing supreme ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the Roman Catholics at the Madras Presidency.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 25.

Mr. J. R. Plumb, the Assistant Accountant of the Bank of Bengal, has been appointed to the office of Deputy Secretary, on a salary of 900 Rupees a month.—Messrs. Dampier, Lewis, Patton and Hawkins, have been appointed a Committee, with Capt. High, to report on the organization of a Police force for the Behar district of the Presidency. Their report is expected to be given in on the 1st of December next.—The Admiral is going round immediately to Bombay, to await the arrival of despatches from England, to instruct him in the course which he is to pursue, in reference to matters in China.—Important intelligence has been received from Cabul. Dost Mahomed Khan, having made his way across the Hindon Koh, has allied himself, by marriage, with the Chiefs of Khoondooz and Khondooz, and was preparing, with their aid, for the invasion of Cabul. Dr. Leed had been despatched to Khoondooz to peace matters on a friendly footing between Shah Sojah and the Chiefs, but he had not proceeded more than forty miles, when he heard of Dost Mahomed's plans and intrigues, and immediately returned. The Envoy, on receiving his report, immediately determined on pushing forward troops to Khowlum. The troops which were prepared to return across the Indus, have, therefore, been ordered to hold fast.—In the fort of Kurnool, which has just been captured by British troops, the most astonishing discovery has been made of a complete arsenal and military workshop, containing between four and five hundred pieces of artillery, for the most part of brass. For particulars we refer to our extracts.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20.

Sir Jasper Nicholls, after having held the good people of Calcutta in breathless expectation for two days, landed yesterday at 11 o'clock. The Governor, and the Steamer which was towing her, both got aground, which occasioned the delay. Sir Jasper had previously requested that the troops might not be drawn up to receive him, and on landing, he proceeded to the Government apartments in the Fort.—The Bombay papers state the alarming fact, that the Atalanta was on fire, and burning with great fury when her papers of the 15th went to press. This is a new and very grievous calamity. The Scamirani is out of use, and has been turned to the ignoble purpose of a coal depot at Aaden; and the loss of the Atalanta leaves us dependent on the Zemobis and the Bernice, and the gentle going Hugh Lindsay.—The Madras papers state, that Bengal owes Madras between eighty and a hundred lakhs of Rupees; that since the suspension of the Madras Mint, this amount of bullion has been sent up to Calcutta for recoinage, but that the Governor General has forgotten to send it back. This is really too bad. Then the papers talk of the 15 lakhs just sent up in H. M. S. Feronite, as a specimen of favoritism, as Capt. West, of the Enterprise Steamer, who was recently sent to Madras for treasure, was told that there was none for him.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 28.

Intelligence has, at length, been received from China to the 17th of August. It is, if possible, more disastrous than ever. The European residents in Amoy, were threatened even there with starvation, and were preparing to embark; and on the Coast, the Chinese Preventive Service was so strong and vigilant, that little business could be done. Yet such is the infatuation attending the Opium trade, that the value of the drug is said to have risen in Calcutta immediately on the arrival of these ominous advices. Capt. Elliot had held a Session of Oyer and Terminer and Jail Delivery, on board of one of the ships.—H. M. S. the Feronite, has brought treasure from Madras, to the amount of fifteen lakhs of Rupees.—The duties of Post Master General, in the North West Provinces, have been separated from that of Calcutta, and Dr. Banken has been appointed to the new office, on a salary of 1,400 Rupees a month.—On Saturday last, Mr. Jeebun, who has been found guilty of embezzlement, such as has never before been practised in the city of Calcutta, got off, through a flaw in the indictment.—Lord Auckland has taken the Nott and Wiltshire affair into his own hands, and appointed General Nott to the command of the troops in Afghanistan; an appointment which will afford general satisfaction to the army.—The accounts received from the army assembled at Kurnool, are very distressing. The Cholera is making frightful ravages. Captain Lewis, the Deputy Assistant Adjutant General, Dr. Davis, of H. M. 39th Foot, and Brigadier Bell, have fallen victims to it.—Sir Henry Fane has taken his passage on the Malabar, which leaves Bombay on the 3rd of January.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 29.

Disturbances have already commenced in the Lahore Court. Cheyt Sing, a favourite of the late Runjeet Sing, and also of his son, the present Rajah, was found to be in the way of the Minister, Dhean Sing, who instigated Now Nehal Sing, the son of the moonshir, to put him to death. He was accordingly despatched in open Court, in the royal presence. In the scuffle, two other persons were wounded, and the King himself received a slight wound. He is surrounded with troops, apparently for his honour, but he is in reality their prisoner.—It is stated that Lord Auckland does not return to the Presidency as early as was expected. The difficulties created by Dost Mahomed Khan, afford the political reason for His Lordship's protracted residence in the Hill.—The Burkara states that the salary attached to the abolition of office of Deputy Registrar of the Sudder Court, is to be applied to the payment of Bengalee and Oordoo Translators. The office of Translator has now been two years in abeyance; during which period a population of sixty millions has been left in total ignorance of the laws, which they were penally bound to obey.—The Ceylon Government has sacrificed a revenue of 7,000*l.* a year, collected from an injudicious tax on fish, to the welfare of the people.—The Cholera has broken out with fearful malignity in the army assembled at Jeypore. One hundred men have been carried off in a single day.—Mr. Baues, the merchant, left Lahore on the 10th September, on his way to Cabul, with large supplies for the Army, by whom his arrival will be welcomed with no ordinary satisfaction.—Two Natives of the name of Ban Bux and Devy Singh, have actually traversed India, and walked down from Sirdhana, sixteen hundred miles, in order to present a petition of grievances to the Deputy Governor of Bengal, which they should have presented to the Governor General at Simlah, not two hundred miles from their residence.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India:—

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

KURNUL.

* The discoveries have been almost exclusively confined to the Nuvab's Zenamah, which proves to be a perfect arsenal upon a most extended scale: and you will stare to read that there have been found concealed in various ways—underground and in godowns whose doors and entrances had been built up—between 4 and 500 pieces of artillery, of which fully 100 are in such state of equipment as to be ready for active service in the field at a few days warning.

* A great many exceedingly well constructed furnaces are now standing in perfect order for casting guns and shot, and the ruins of many more have been found in various places: an immense quantity of shot of all sizes, grape and canister, longridge, hand grenades and shells of various diameters—all made of a species of pewter, but containing more lead and less tin than the compound so called usually does—have been found, while of copper, lead and zinc a considerable store has been ferreted out. Several very fine brass guns (I should mention that almost the whole of the pieces found in the Fort are of brass) have been dug up, and 2 mortars of the same metal, which for size—and perhaps also for beauty of casting—promise to rank as the most remarkable of their genus in Europe: the bore of the largest is 26 inches, thickness of metal 9 inches, and length from muzzle to cascabel about 7 feet; the other has a bore of 22½ inches and the other dimensions in proportion. A great many muskets, musket locks (English), pistols (do.) and swords have also been turned up; heaps of cartridges ready to be filled—also port fires, fuses, fire balls, slow matches, a large store of sulphur, resin, fine charcoal for gunpowder, in short every material required to constitute a large and most valuable arsenal are here:—and it is evident, from the workmanship of his gun carriages and limbers, the beauty and correctness of casting, and (in many cases) boring of his guns, the construction of his furnaces and the general order and arrangement of this most extraordinary military workshop and store-house, that the master hand has been that of a practised and scientific man, whose subordinates must have been artificers well qualified to conduct gun founding and carriage building, as well as laboratory works, in all their departments. The most remarkable and important conclusion which is at once drawn from the development, as far as it has proceeded, of this most stupendous plot, is that the aim of the Nuvab or his coadjutors has been to produce an efficient and powerful train of Artillery, not so much for the defence of this fort as for active field service—which it needs little scope of imagination to conclude would, at the fitting time, have been undertaken to work out the subversion and overthrow of the British dynasty in India. The majority of the guns are of small calibre, principally 4 and 6 pounders, and of these in one g-dow, the entrances to which had been carefully built up, were found 41, very efficiently mounted on light field carriages quite fit for immediate use; while in the same place were 42 carriages of a like description, evidently only recently completed and ready to receive their guns and coats of paint. It is difficult, from a hasty survey, to form anything which one might venture to consider a correct opinion, as to the period which this manufacture of warlike engines and stores has extended—some have the appearance of considerable age, while many, especially of the brass 62 pounders, and nearly the whole of the newer round shot, from the little oxidation visible on their surface, and which long exposure to the atmosphere would have produced to a considerable extent, convey the impression that the furnaces which have been found, here within a very short period—possibly 2 or 3 months—been in full operation; and, when we consider that this really gigantic manufacture, from which the implements for the destruction of our empire were to have sprung, has been collecting and increasing daily, in strength and extent, almost in the very heart of our dominions, in a manner so stealthy as to have been (of course until lately) scarcely suspected by the Government and their authorities, we are lost in astonishment at the extent and power of the resources which have furnished the means to dig so tremendous a mine beneath our feet, and in wonder and amazement as to the time and the agents to be chosen or created for its exploitation.

"We cannot at the same time, I think, fail to admire the prudent foresight exhibited by the Government in having taken so prompt steps, which have led to so complete a development (the unvarnished remains yet behind) of this extraordinary conspiracy, which at the period of the arrival of the Commissioners was evidently in a state so ripe as to require only the 'hand to the plough' to burst with astounding fury over Southern India."—Madras Spectator.

On Sunday evening, about 1/2 past 8, an alarm was given that one of the vessels in the Harb'ur, believed to be a Steamer, was on fire, and in an incredibly short space, the whole population seemed to be in movement, by the time we reached the Apollo Bunder, 50 carriages at least having collected there, and along the ramparts, on the house tops and wherever a view could be got, crowds were to be seen gathered together, anxiously gazing at the spectacle. Even at this early period, so great was the mass of light, that objects could be distinctly seen all along the beach, the houses, spires and every object, within its range, being apparently lit up, as in an illumination, and proceeding one of the most curious and at the same time fearful spectacles, that we ever recollect to have witnessed. It very soon became known that the object of our anxiety was the Atalanta Steamer. The fire, though raging furiously, appeared to be confined to the after part of the vessel, the Poona and Calcutta, of which it had got entire possession, and it was early on the attempt to dislodge it, or put it down, was altogether hopeless. Accordingly every effort was bent to prevent its spreading forward; the Officers of the Hastings, Elphinstone and Margaret were immediately on the spot, and aided by the Officers and Crews of several of the Merchant vessels in Port, particularly by Captain Thomson, of the Clipper, and the men of the Herefordshire, and also aided by the stillness of the night, they ultimately succeeded in their object, though not till after a struggle which lasted for 4 hours, and till the entire after part of the vessel had been burnt to the water's edge. During this operation, by the admirable arrangements of Captain Oliver, our chief superintendent, who was early on the spot, and directed every thing, not only did they succeed in putting down the fire, but the vessel was warped so near the shore that, had she sunk, there would have been no difficulty in recovering her machinery, and getting her up at any time. We are happy to hear that the damage she has sustained is not irreparable, and that her machinery has escaped without the slightest injury.—Madras Courier.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

ON THE DANGER OF NOT NATIONALIZING THE PROVINCIAL ADMINISTRATION TO MITIGATE THE COLLISION BETWEEN THE OLD FACTS AND NEW THEORIES, WHICH THE PRESS IS BRINGING TO BEAR ON THEM.

To the Editors of the Friend of India:

SIRS,—The establishment of a demi-official and Educational Gazette, may seem to have but little connection with the above subject; but as I proceed, the connection will, I trust, become apparent.

Firstly; as to the demi official and Educational Gazette, it seems to me, that, for reasons I have learnt from you, none but Government could prudently undertake one; and, further, that the union of the two departments indicated in the title, would promote, and, indeed, must be necessary, to the circulation of either portion. Further; the circulation would, as it seems to me, be much promoted by making the Gazette almost the only mean of communication with the Native public, including all Native officials, down even to village authorities; so that they might actually suffer from unacquaintance with the notifications of the Gazette, and might thus be, in some degree, constrained to accept the intended benefits thereof.

The educational advantage of the Gazette would consist in its bringing knowledge in a direct and copious stream to every village; while through the demi-official department, the Government might promulgate its laws; all decisions on important points of law; all circular orders, which should not be, as at present, concealed by interested Natives, from those concerned. The Government might also, through the same medium, quiet the public mind, when disturbed by false rumours, and may pre-occupy the ground which foreign or internal enemies may elsewhere sow with tares of sedition; and such Gazette may also counteract the Native Press, which is doing so much to vilify the ruling caste, and to produce division between it and the ruled caste.

It is partly from an apprehension of this last mentioned element of division, that I consider a nationalizing of the provincial administration to be urgently necessary; both because such a course of action would (particularly if come before it is claimed,) be very popular; and would thus, by bringing the interests of the people in closer union and adhesion with Government, counteract the divisive operations of the Native Press; and, further, I would seek to nationalize the provincial administration, because I believe that such national administration will, in the long run, (whatever it is now,) be the only improving administration, and the only popular administration, when the people begin to cast off the prestige which has hitherto protected our Government from their scrutiny.

I have, in a former letter to you, said, that every new office held out for the ambition of Natives, is another root put down in the soil of the country; each will be a nucleus of attachment and improving ambition; and when many such are established, all the provincial communities will be pervaded with a new class of improving motives, and an entirely new action to which the roots of their stunted intellects have hitherto never been subjected.

Furthermore; every such office will be a standing attraction for a hundred persons, with their thousands dependants and connecting interests to the provinces; and thus the centrifugal power of the capital; the termination of blood to the head; the centralized unworkableness of the general government will be drawn to the extremities and mitigated; a new order of things will be adopted for the new theories of the press; new bottles for the new wine, which might burst the old bottles.

Nothing, I submit, would tend so much to fit the Natives for the above course of measures, as the universal circulation of the demi-official and Educational Gazette; and nothing would so much grace its first pages, as some earnest of a less anti-national and exclusive administration in the provinces.

Yours,
CASSANDRA.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIRS,—Having so ably assisted in those animated discussions,

"The channel which the Education Committee would establish in making English the medium of pre-diffusing knowledge, will not be a 'direct and copious stream,' but a narrow and circuitous channel, in which half of the benefits will be deteriorated or absorbed before they can dribble through 'its wearisome and not needful length.'"

I am almost ashamed of again reverting, that certain acquisitions in primary education may be made a star and gale even of the best public service the spread of the effect expected from the Gazette would also depend much on the previous extension of primary education—that would find which along higher education will be almost a spontaneous growth.

I find (which that the anti-national administration of the forward caste, has been attended with general inequality of property, and rather general pauperism. Way, then, not give more anti-national administration the fair trial it now has had? Is it because every office given to a Native is one lost to the service?

which not long since insisted on the impropriety of compelling the gentlemen of the service to manage and administer to idolatrous and Heathen Endowments, and their abominable customs, I and others of your subscribers have been much disappointed and astonished, that you have taken no notice of the appointments in the Government Gazette, of the 21st September last, dated 18th of that month, by which a Hindoo Mooniff and a Mahomedan Sudder Ameen have been made Local Agents under the provisions of Regulation XIX. of 1810.

Is it no subject for rejoicing, that this initiatory step to release Christians from such revolting service has been taken? Are those who have brought about such an emancipation entitled to no notice? Or have you been asleep?

Yours, &c.

A SUBSCRIBER AND ADMIRER OF YOUR PAPER.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIRs.—You profess to be the Friend of India; of course, you feel disposed to take a lively interest in its welfare; but there is a moral evil and vital grievance to which the people of this vast country have been made to groan, which has been entirely overlooked by your brother Editors, and especially by yourself, i.e. the additional burden of one anna or little more, as Batta, to every Rupce for Land-tax, originated from the introduction of Company's Rupce, in lieu of Sicca. The poor Ryots are not only inconvenienced by the current Batta system, in buying necessities for life, but subjected to Batta for Government Jumma, levied by the Zemindars. Therefore, Mr. Editors, can you, or any of your readers, throw light upon the subject, whether it is the Zemindars themselves take the liberty of imposing on the Ryots with such taxation, or Government is benefited in it? If deserving, oblige me with a corner.

I remain,
P. TENNEN.

We publish the letter of our native correspondent without correction.—Ed.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIRs.—As the subject of Native Education is now brought prominently before the public. I beg to offer a few remarks on the comparative merits of the English and Native languages, as the medium of communication, in the instruction of the people.

It is obvious that, in order to effect any great change in the habits and manners of a people, or any great improvement in their knowledge and principles, education must be as widely extended as possible, so as to pervade the masses. Any system which is partial, must fail in effecting any permanent or essential good; and that system must have the preference, which may be expected to produce the most speedy, and the most general effects, more especially among the ignorant and illiterate part of the population.

You have very ably stated in several numbers of your paper, the difficulties which the Natives of this country will have to surmount, if the English language alone made the basis of a national system of Education; but it may not be amiss to enlarge a little upon the subject.

It seems entirely to have escaped the observation of the advocates of English, that whatever progress may be made, and whatever success may attend upon their efforts in English instruction, the benefit will be confined entirely to those who have already surmounted the difficulties, and acquired a knowledge of the language. Should their efforts to extend instruction in that language be relaxed at any time, and matters be allowed to take their natural course, the progress of education would be delayed, and almost brought to a stand; and even if a thousand persons were well educated by means of the English language, their knowledge and experience would be of little or no use to the very next student, who would have the same difficulties to encounter and surmount. We are, in fact, by this plan, working against the grain, and endeavouring to force things out of their natural course. Such would not be the case with a system based upon instruction in the Native languages. If a plentiful supply of translations of elementary works, on the different branches of Education was made into the Native languages, and applied to the purposes of general education, the benefits would extend to successive generations. Every child must, of necessity, acquire his Native language, and as soon as he could read, his instruction might commence; and then from his early childhood, he might be making progress in that knowledge, which is of such essential consequence. It might grow with his growth, and strengthen with his strength. In the one case, you are prepared at once to enter upon a system of instruction in a language that must and will be learnt; in the other no instruction whatever can be communicated till a second, and most difficult language, has been acquired. In the one case you take advantage of things as they are, and run on in a smooth and easy course; in the other, you violate prejudices, and endeavour to force instruction into an unnatural and inconvenient channel. In the one case your progress may be likened to that of a heavy laden vehicle, toiling up a steep ascent, and dragged by a pair of jaded horses; in the other, to that of the same vehicle relieved of all incumbrances, and drawn by four spirited animals along a well macadamised road. The choice is set before us, whether we will glide with the stream, with all sails set, and wind and tide in our favour, or whether we will labour against the current, with outstretched oars, and painful efforts, and with the almost certain prospect of being baffled, and of being compelled to return, in order to start again, under more favourable auspices. The good that will be done by a system based upon English Education, will be essentially evanescent; it will be written on the sand; it will be confined solely to the ears of those who have surmounted the difficulties of the language; it may not descend even to their children; while in the other case, the books will be always available, and the knowledge contained in them may be handed down from father to son, through successive generations.

It is far from my intention to argue that instruction in the English language is of no value. On the contrary, I would encourage the acquirement of it by Natives, when so disposed, by all proper and reasonable means, just as I would encourage my children to acquire a knowledge of French or Latin; but I should no more consent that either of those languages should form the basis of the instruction of my children, than I would that the English language should be the basis in the case of the Natives of this country.

It appears surprising to me, that the inconvenience and absurdity of this plan is not generally perceived. If a proposal were made to establish a national system of education for the English in the French or Latin languages, the absurdity and injustice of it would at once be apparent; but the prejudice in favour of every thing English, and the desire to continue this country as a mere appendage of the British Crown, are so strong, that many either will not, or cannot, perceive, that we should be doing precisely the same thing by fixing upon the English language, as the basis of a national system of Education for this country.

There is no kind of knowledge which may not be communicated to the Natives, by means of a plentiful supply of translations of judiciously selected works; more especially on primary Education; and surely it would be far better that our system should be established on such a basis, that the present prejudices and acquirements of the Natives would be all in our favour, than that we should endeavour to force education into an unnatural and inconvenient channel—a channel, disagreeable to the feelings of the Natives themselves, and one in which we may chance to find, after the loss of much money, time and labour, that our success has been very limited, and that we are as far from having attained our object, as regards the instruction and improvement of the mass of the people, as ever.

Let any one, well acquainted with the country, and the state of knowledge, and intelligence among the lower classes, consider for a moment, what length of time it would require to establish a system of Education, based upon English, which should take effect on the lower classes, such as ryots, coolies, &c.; and if our system did not have such effect, we should be merely trifling with the subject, and the system would not be a general or national one.

The case appears to me so clear, that I do not hesitate to say, if the English language is to be the basis of our system, then the education of the majority of the people is postponed indefinitely. As a proof of the probable working of the two systems, I give the following anecdote: An intelligent Native, one of can read English books, and write an English letter, called upon the writer of this article one morning, in great delight at the publication of a new work in his own language, though the work was nothing but an absurd and useless collection of moral maxims. Be it observed, that the Native in question might, at any time, have obtained English works on various subjects of an amusing and interesting nature; yet he never thought of doing so; while he was quite delighted at the publication of a new work in his own language, though of an absurd and useless nature; the individual himself being at the same time a person of superior intellect and attainments. Let the case be applied to ourselves. Do not intelligent and well educated Englishmen, though capable of reading works in foreign languages, still prefer their own, for all the ordinary purposes of life; and why should we expect the case to be different with the Natives of this country, who are remarkable for their attachment to every thing belonging to their own country, and for their prejudices against every thing appertaining to foreigners? It appears to me that the opinions of individuals upon this subject, will receive altogether tone and coloring, in a great degree, from their future intentions regarding this country and its people.

There are three courses open to us. First; we may endeavour to go on in a quiet and easy way, leaving things just as they are, without troubling ourselves much about the future; and without, in fact, knowing precisely what our future intentions are, and leaving them to be regulated by the course of events. Secondly; we may endeavour to anglicise the country; and, thirdly, we may educate, and enlighten the people, and improve their condition, as well as their principles and moral feelings, with a view to resign the Government into their hands at some future period.

NEW BISHOPS.—The Queen has nominated the Rev. John Strachan, D. D., Archbishop of York, to the Bishopric of Toronto, in the Province of Upper Canada; and the Rev. Andrew George Spencer, D. D., Archbishop of Bermuda, to the Bishopric of Newfoundland.—Gazette.

ADVOWSON.—The Court of Common Pleas has decided that where a living has two patrons, one a Protestant and the other a Roman Catholic, the living shall remain only in the gift of the Protestant. The Bishop of Exeter, by this decision, acquires the right of presentation to the living of Combepeyne, Mr. Edwards, the other patron, being a Catholic; and the bishop has bestowed it upon the Rev. E. J. Todd, a Whig gentleman, totally unknown to his lordship, and whose recommendation for the preferment was the faithful and meritorious discharge of his duties as curate in the diocese.—Exeter Flying Post.

RECTORSHIP OF ST. MARY-LE-STRAND.—At a Vestry held in the vestry-room of the above parish, on Thursday, for the purpose of laying before the parishioners the official appointment of the Reverend Joshua Frederick Denham to the rectorship, presented to that gentleman by the Lord Chancellor, a resolution was unanimously adopted expressing their thanks to the Lord Chancellor for his kind consideration in receiving and supplying with the rectory of the substantial appointment of the Rev. J. F. Denham, M. A., who had long been the officiating curate, and who only received 20*l.* a-year, and surplice fees; while Mr. Gambier, the deceased rector, carried off a good round annual sum, though he had not been near the rectory for many years previous to his dissolution.—Christ. Adv.

OPEN-AIR PARACHING.—The Committee of the Christian Instruction Society are resolved to follow out the resolution passed at the recent Centenary celebration of the labours of the Rev. George Whitefield. In addition to the tent and open-air services conducted in London and its suburbs, an extensive correspondence has taken place with ministers in different parts of the kingdom on that subject. An open-air preaching tour was undertaken last week, by the Rev. C. Gilbert of Ilkington, and the Rev. J. Young, of Albion Chapel, as a disputation from the Society, in Hertfordshire. They met with the sanction and assistance of the ministers in the towns where they preached. On Sunday week a very serious service was commenced on behalf of the Society, by the Rev. George Rose, of Bermuda, on Windmill Hill, Grave-end, at which a large number of persons attended.—Ibid.

GENERAL BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.—The seventeenth annual association of the new connexion of General Baptists was held at Nottingham last week. It commenced on Tuesday evening, and terminated on Friday at noon. The Rev. R. Ingham, of Belper, was elected President. The Rev. G. Chasle, of Birmingham, and the Rev. J. Gossaly, jun., of Leicester, acted as Moderators. The Rev. H. Hunter, of Nottingham, was secretary. The Annual Letter to the churches, on "the conduct to be pursued towards persons excluded from church-fellowship," was written by the senior minister of the denomination, the Rev. W. Pickering, of Nottingham, and was an invaluable production. This Union comprises 120 churches, who hold the depravity of human nature, the divinity and atonement of Christ, the universality of his death, justification by faith alone, regeneration by the agency of the Holy Spirit, in connexion with the word, the baptism of believers by immersion, and other important doctrines. The present number of members is 15,000.—Ibid.

THE UNITED SESSIAN SYNOD have been holding their sittings during the past fortnight at Edinburgh. The Synod, irrespectively of its regular congregations, has under its charge sixty home missionary stations constantly or occasionally supplied with preaching; of these, eight are supplied by as many congregations. The Synod has four Gaelic missionaries and three Gaelic catechists. Notwithstanding the removal, by death, of the Rev. John Monnard, who had been sent by the Synod to conduct a mission in Peru, the mission to France had not been abandoned; Mr. Major, of Strassburg, having taken it up. There are now thirteen ministers in the Canadian Presbytery, and upwards of forty congregations under their inspection. In Jamaica there are now six ministers and six catechists or teachers, and one minister and two catechists in Trinidad. In both islands the mission was flourishing greatly. The Rev. Mr. Glen continues in Persia, prosecuting the translation of the Old Testament Scriptures into Persian. Between October 1837 and May 1839, there had been contributed to the mission fund, 7,019*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, and expended on foreign missions, 5,028*l.* 3*s.* 7*d.*, and, on home missions, 1,050*l.* 18*s.*, besides 1,157*l.* 4*s.* of expenses common to both, amounting in the whole to 7,185*l.* 4*s.* 7*d.*. To the next meeting of the Synod, the Rev. Mr. Glen undertakes to add 2,557*l.* has been subscribed, and when the cases under consideration came to be disposed of, the whole would be expended. The aid given was in all cases to be under the condition of corresponding exertions by the congregations. The Synod took into consideration an overture by the Rev. Dr. Thompson, of Coldstream, proposing; that the Synod should appoint a committee to take into consideration the propriety of devising the best means for securing a complete literary and philosophical, as well as theological, education to candidates for the ministry, without its being made imperative on them as heretofore to attend certain classes in the national universities, while these institutions continue to be constituted and conducted as at present. In introducing his overture, Dr. Thompson remarked, that the more he knew of the Dissenting Seminaries in England, the more he admired them; and any one who was acquainted with them, and knew also the wretched condition of the Scottish Universities, would not, for an instant, compare them in point of efficacy even in literature. As to moral philosophy in particular, which had been so properly referred to by another speaker, as taught in the Universities, it was nothing but a species of refined Deism. It was nothing but a preparation for the holy ministry. Dr. Ritchie supported the overture, and the Synod agreed to appoint a committee to take the subject into consideration, and to report to the Synod at next meeting. The Rev. Mr. Blackburn, of London, was introduced to the Synod, and some observations were made by several members of the Synod on the importance of the various bodies of Evangelical Dissenters drawing together more closely, and the possibility of doing so without any sacrifice of principle.—Ibid.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF STOCKHOLM died at Upsal on the 20th ult. He was considered the most able preacher in Sweden, and his death is felt as a severe loss to the Church of the country.—Ibid.

EDUCATION.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY.—The annual examination of the girls educating in the system of this useful institution took place on Thursday-week in the school of the establishment, in the Borough-road. Sir H. R. Hippisley, Bart., presided in the absence of Sir T. Baring, who was to have taken the chair. The president was supported by the Lord Bishop of Norwich, Lord Ilkley, and several other gentlemen of distinction. There were present about 100 ladies. The number of children examined was about 400, varying from the age of seven to sixteen. They were questioned in the elements of literature, arithmetic, geography, and scripture knowledge, and their answers, which were necessarily from the stores of memory, as the queries were unexpected, were highly to their credit and to that of the teachers. By far the most interesting part of the examination was that which Mrs. McCrae, the superintendent matron, conducted in person. She first showed their habits of uniform, simultaneous action, by putting the girls in a variety of positions in connection with the making and exhibiting of several kinds of needle-work, and then throwing them into confused groups, from which in an instant they re-formed into regular lines. Mrs. McCrae next questioned the children on the philosophy of baking, stowing, scouring, looking after children in health and sickness, and making, mending, and buying cloths of all descriptions, from a blue dress to a pinafore. The children's answers showed that they had been exceedingly well taught. The exhibition impressed all present with a high opinion of the merits of this truly polytechnic school.—Christ. Adv.

STEPNEY COLLEGE.—On Friday evening, June 28, the annual meeting of Stepney College was held at the King's Head Tavern, Pooley; and the treasurer, W. B. Gurney, Esq., in the chair. During the last year, twenty-six students have enjoyed the benefits of the institution, and the reports of the tutors as to their conduct, and those of the examiners as to their attainments in the several departments of learning to which they had applied themselves, were exceedingly gratifying. The enlargement of the College, which was announced in our pages during the last year as begun, has been for some months completed, and we are happy to add, owing to the laudable exertions of several of the ministers educated at Stepney, the whole cost of it has been discharged. Two of its late students are at this moment, as missionaries, on their voyage to remote parts of the world; the Rev. Francis Tucker, B. A., to Calcutta, and the Rev. E. Francis to Jamaica. The College term of three of the young men expires with the present session.—Mr. Morgan, Mr. Spurgeon, and Mr. Thomas Burditt.—P.M.

SPRING-HILL COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.—On Wednesday, the 12th of June, the annual meeting of the trustees and subscribers was held. It appeared that the receipts amounted to £2,400. 18s., of which £1,270. had been received from the trustees, 500*l.* as a donation from John Lee, Esq., of Kidderminster, and 651*l.* from sub-scriptions and donations. The treasurer further explained, that the £1,741. received from the trustees comprised two years' income arising from the trust property, that of the year previous to the opening of the college having been reserved to meet its extraordinary expenses connected with the opening of the College; that the 500*l.* presented by Mr. Lee had been invested in valid securities, at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, in order that the interest might be applied to defray the expenses of a scholar-ship bearing his name; and that of the 651*l.* 18s., accruing in the form of subscriptions and donations, 550*l.* had been given by Mrs. Glover and Miss Mansfield, and might be considered as the probable amount of the future annual donations. There was already, notwithstanding the reserve of a year's income, a balance in the treasurer's books against the institution of upwards of 1,000*l.* which, before the opening of the next session, would, by the payment of the building accounts which would become due, and the purchase of other necessary furniture, amount to nearly 2,000*l.* The average yearly expenditure, with three tutors and twenty students, accommodation being provided for thirty-two, should the constitution sanction the admission of that number, would be 1,050*l.* per annum, to meet which, the institution at present possessed but 1,250*l.* per annum, including 100*l.* subscribed by the limited constituency formed for the purpose of commencing operations. The treasurer announced, in closing, his intention to subscribe 50*l.* towards the deficiency caused by building expenses, and 50*l.* per annum for five years as his own subscription to the institution.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TAXATION.—On the motion for going into a committee of supply, Mr. Fielden moved the repeal of the taxes on malt, hops, soap, candles, and tallow, coals, sugar, and molasses, tea, coffee, butter, cheese, currants and raisins, corn, cotton, and sheep's wool imported, silk, hide, and skins, and paper, amounting to 17,614,345*l.*, and to substitute a property tax. Mr. Williams seconded the motion. In the present state of taxation, he said, the poorer and middle classes were burdened much more heavily than the rich. The motion was lost by a majority of 38 to 13.—Ibid.

SUPPLY.—The House went into a committee of supply, when the Irish estimates and the miscellaneous estimates were voted without any discussion of interest. The vote of 8,928*l.* for the College of Mayo was opposed by Lord Cole and Lord Castlereagh, but was carried by a majority of 38 to 9. Amongst the miscellaneous estimates there were voted—5,812*l.* to enable the trustees of the British Museum to purchase Dr.

Mantell's geological collection, and Signor Anastasi's collection of antiquities; 7250*l.* for the purchase of pictures for the National Gallery, for the year 1889; 10,000*l.* for the new buildings at the British Museum; and 55,000*l.* towards the expense of erecting a model prison.—Ibid.

CHARTISTS.—The Rev. J. R. Stephens has received notice, that his trial will take place at Chester on the 14th inst. for the indictment which was found against him there at the last assizes. The trial of Mr. Doull is also fixed to come on at Chester on the same day. Stephens will also be tried at the Liverpool assizes for using sedition language at Leigh, for which he was committed from Manchester.—Ibid.

NOTTINGHAM.—On Saturday last, a number of the Chartists, calculated at from 500 to 700, assembled in the Market-place and other parts of the town, and proceeded to St. Mary's Church. The regular congregation having been fully apprised of the intended visit, was not so large as usual, as the timorous and females had taken alarm, consequently there was abundance of accommodation; but the whole of the pews were occupied. The Rev. M. D. French, M. A. curate, preached an appropriate sermon from Acts 10, verse 33, "Now are we all present before God, to hear all things that are commanded of God." A report had prevailed in the town during the week, that the Chartists intended to remain after the service, and receive the sacrament, but instead of doing so, they all retired peaceably from the church at the conclusion of the service. The behaviour of the parties during the service, and at its close, was extremely orderly.—Chris. Adv.

BIRMINGHAM CHARTISTS, 11TH AUGUST, SUNDAY, THREE O'CLOCK.—As regards the actual state of affairs here—the Chartist metropolis—my own opinion is that they are in a very slunken condition. The very fact of the association having been at one time so completely organised, has made the smallest part of the system being disturbed the more difficult to be adjusted. They are all the leaders, so called, at sixes and sevens, and full of suspicion one of another. Some are accused of having cleared hold of funds illegally. They denounce Feargus O'Connor as a renegade and a traitor—and he as well as Stevens they declare to have been from the commencement in rely Government spies. Dr. Taylor openly avows that he is prepared with documentary proof to this effect. Mr. O'Brien shares in a similar condemnation of alleged imputations. Feargus O'Connor, who at one time pressed us steadily for the celebration of the month's holidays, now retract, and recommends only a holiday of a few days. It had come to this pass, that some who were to be tried had arrived at the conviction that they had been worse treated, and had worse men to deal with in the officers of their own association than they had in the administration and administrators of the Government, which they had stood forth to oppose.—Pat. Present State of "Socialism."

I.—There are now upwards of sixty branch societies in the principal towns of the Kingdom, in which there are places of meeting for lectures on Infidelity and "Socialism."

II.—The Sabbath is occupied in the delivery of seditious and blasphemous addresses, tea-parties, profane singing and music, &c. &c.

III.—In some places Sunday and infant schools have been established, for the inculcating of infidel principles.

IV.—A Trust Society has been formed, and six tracts issued; these are frequently distributed under the Wesleyan and Church tract covers.

V.—A most blasphemous weekly periodical is circulated, at the rate of 40,000 per week.

VI.—There is a regularly organized Central Board, with President, Vice President, and Secretary, and a great number of salaried emissaries, whose whole time is devoted to the advancement of "Socialism." Additional impetus has been given to their proceedings by the successful presentation of their founder, Robert Owen, to the Queen, by the first Minister of the Crown.—Ibid.

SEIZURES FOR CHURCH-RATES.—On Saturday last, two of the borough constables seized twenty-five umbrellas, the selling price of which is 6*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, the property of Mr. Steer in this town, for a Church-rate amounting to 1*l.* 3*d.* The same day six chevrons were seized, weighing 6*lb.* 4*oz.*, belonging to Mr. John Cheltenham, for a rate of 6*s.* 8*d.* It is high time that this highly objectionable and oppressive mode of maintaining the Church was abrogated. It must be offensive to every right-minded Churchman to see men despoiled of their goods for the support of his worship in this manner. The Quakers have long borne this vexatious loss of their property almost without complaint; but other persons are adopting their principles, and it is not improbable that in a short time passive resistance will be found so troublesome to the oppressors that they will be glad to let their victims escape, by accepting the very reasonable measure proposed by Government.—Dorset Reporter.

EXETER.—At the meeting of the Exeter Town Council on Friday, the city treasurer declared that he had neither money nor credit, and that city did not possess the funds to pay 8*l.* for a supply of potatoes to the gnil.—Christ. Adc.

THE STORM OF WEDNESDAY NIGHT.—DESTRUCTIVE FIRES BY THE LIGHTNING.—At a late hour on Wednesday night the metropolis was visited by a most severe storm, which lasted for some time, and occasioned very great devastation. It burst forth about half-past nine o'clock instantaneously, and apparently had passed over the Western counties, with the same violence as it exhibited in London; rain and hail fell in tremendous torrents, while flashes of lightning, with remarkable vividness, illuminated the atmosphere all over the metropolis, and to that extent that nearly all the public buildings were perceptible with that clearness as in the noon-day. Shortly after the outbreak of the storm the excitement in the metropolis was increased by a destructive fire, which originated by the electric fluid enveloping a huffer match manufactory, the property of a person understood to be Clarkson, situated in a densely-populated neighbourhood, Bull-alley, Golden-lane, in the parish of St. Luke. Notwithstanding the heavy torrents of hail and rain that were descending at the time, the conflagration raged forth with terrific rapidity, the reflection of which could be observed from the various bridges across the Thames, and a considerable distance round London. About the same time another conflagration, supposed to have been occasioned by the lightning, burst forth from some stables, situated near the Regent's Canal, towards Lee, which were entirely burnt down before the engines arrived. On approaching the river after the storm, which lasted upwards of an hour, it appeared very much swollen, and the current was exceedingly strong, and it is feared that great havoc has taken place, by the swamping of small craft, and other vessels. The sewer at the foot of Blackfriars Bridge had, during the storm, a singular appearance, and attracted a large assemblage of persons, by the very great noise which the rain created in discharging itself from the mouth of the sewer, the force of which was tremendous. Large numbers of skylights were demolished by the force of the hailstones.—Ibid.

ICE SNOWS.—On Sunday night, a very heavy hail-storm did much damage to conservatories and skylights in different parts of the South of England, especially in Surrey and Sussex. In Brighton, 3,000 panes of glass were broken; and upwards of 8,000 panes were charged in Lord Arden's green-houses in Surrey. The hail was of an unusually large size; some pieces of an irregular shape and measuring four or five inches in circumference. On the same evening, there was a good deal of lightning and thunder.—Ibid.

SNOW STORM ON JULY 28.—During a thunder storm Sunday was completely overcast, even to the very base of the snow, which remained for some hours afterwards, forming a strange subject at this particular season of the year, amidst the rich verdant scenery of the neighbourhood.—Whitehall Herald.

DAMAGE TO RIPON MINSTER BY LIGHTNING.—On Monday afternoon between three and four o'clock, a heavy shower of rain fell at Ripon, attended with thunder and lightning, which appeared to have done much damage to the cathedral, but we are glad to hear no lives have been lost by this awful visitation, though four men were thrown down and some of them a little scorched, but they all soon recovered.—Christ. Adc.

NARROW ESCAPE.—The week before last, at Harrogate, a boy about ten years of age having dropped something in a small corn bin in the stable at Bellvue House at present untenanted, jumped into it, when the lid closed, the heap clamping on the staple in front. The bin being but thirty-one inches long, the same deep, and twenty wide, and the lid fitting very close, he soon felt a difficulty in breathing. He fortunately had a marble in his pocket, which by pressing up the corner of the lid with his head, he contrived to insert. He felt, however, into a kind of asphyxiation, during which the stable was entered, but upon a second more particular search he heard a noise, and made known where he was, after a confinement of sixteen hours.—Ibid.

DR. CHALMERS.—Previous to the procession at the laying of the foundation stone of the Mechanics' Institution, Glasgow, the committee invited several distinguished individuals to the ceremony. Among others, they wrote to Dr. Chalmers, requesting him to preach a sermon on the occasion. A reply was received from him, dated on the 2nd. inst., which we have perused with much interest. It is addressed to the secretary. After stating his inability to attend, the Rev. Doctor says:—"I look forward with great interest to my intercourse with you and the mechanics of Greenock next summer; and all the more that it will probably be the last public service at a distance from home which I shall ever undertake, as I now find, both from the state of my engagements and my strength, that I must withdraw from the labours of active life as speedily as possible."—G. Advertiser.

ANTI-TOBACCO SOCIETY.—It is scarcely under this title has been established at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. The pledge is, "We agree to abstain from tobacco, snuff, &c." and obliging. We will not traffic in them, nor will we prove them as an article of entertainment; and we will, in all our amiable ways, discontinue their use throughout the country."—Christ. Adc.

THE PENALTIES ON PATENTERS for not attaching their name and address [the imprimatur] to every thing they print, can now no longer be endured, except by the Attorney or Solicitor-General.—Ibid.

THE POLISH MEETING, on Saturday week, at the Freemasons' Tavern, was numerously attended; when Lord Dudley Stuart alluded to Lord Melbourne's eulogy of the Czar at the Russian Company's dinner, as one who was "inferior to no man in the world in truth, honour, and justice;" the meeting sent forth a great groan.—Ibid.

MR. KNIBB AND HIS PERSECUTORS.—We find from a letter addressed by this illustrious Missionary to the (Jamaica) Colonial Reformer, that he continues to be teased about the "fifth of March," and other charges equally absurd and unfounded. The following is an extract:—"In this detestable combination to injure my character there are individuals implicated who are more guilty than the needy wretch, who, I have reason to believe, was bribed by money to forward himself. When I obtained the requisite information, I sent out an action against the whole of the parties, and I stated distinctly before the Grand Jury, in Kingston, that not only were the gross charges of theft, drunkenness, and falsehood, which were preferred against me, untrue; but that every thing in the affidavit was equally so; that the name of my parents, the place of my birth, previous occupation, and every minutia was a fabrication, and that the whole was a sinful and deliberate perjury. My evidence was confirmed by my relative, the Rev. B. B. Dexter. I informed the Grand Jury that I had never seen, spoken to, or heard from, or corresponded with, Thomas Jones, and that far from being referred to him, he fixed the place of my birth 120 miles from where I was born; and did I know that such being was in existence had not appeared as my beggar. The action was so laid that the infamous co-pirators would have had every opportunity of proving the truth of their charges if they could have done so, and I affirmed that that was my motive in bringing the action. Evidence was offered to the Grand Jury, that the affidavit was in the handwriting of Walter Sidney Myers, a man, then in the employ of the Dispatch, and that he paid the money to have Thomas Jones sworn. Other evidence of a strong nature was adduced, but the secret tribunal ignored the bill against all the parties, and have thus, for the present, prevented my exposing these wretched beings to the contempt of the world. I have forwarded the whole of the proceedings to England, with an urgent request that they may be submitted by Dr. Lushington to Her Majesty's Ministers. If it is possible, at any toil or cost, to bring the comers and publishers of this disgraceful transaction to justice, I am determined to do it. If I fail, I shall only add one more victim to the number of those who have found that it is impossible to obtain justice at the hands of the British Jury, if one is suspected of being in the least attached to the sacred cause of liberty.—Christ, Adm.

THE DYING PITT.—The most melancholy ornithological exhibition that I remember to have witnessed, was that of a wounded dipper, which was shot through the lungs, above Crummond Bridge, near Edinburgh. It stood still, without attempting to fly off, apparently insensible to all external objects, its legs bent, its wings drooping, its head declined. The blood was oozing from its side and gurgling in its wings, which the bird made ineffectual efforts to clear. At intervals, a convulsive heaving of the chest took place, followed by an effort to vomit. In this state the sufferer stood for five minutes, until I got over the stream to it, when it expired in my hand.—Macgillivray.

ORGANIZATION OF THE POLICE.—JALOWY.—We entreat the particular attention of those who feel an interest in the reform of our Police system, to the letter of our Correspondent, Reform, which furnishes details of the organization of the Police in the Jalow district, upon principles similar to those we have advocated in this journal. Jalow is an independent principality in Bundelkand, politically subservient to the paramount authority of Britain. In its palmy days it yielded, we are told, a revenue of more than sixteen lakhs of Rupees a year. Mismanagement on the part of the Native Officers in the State, however, brought them down to about six lakhs; and the late Rajah was induced to hypothecate his estate to the Court of Gwalior, for five lakhs of Rupees. That Court, at length, demanded either the repayment of the loan, or the surrender of the estate. The British Government considering it impolitic to permit the extension of foreign influence into Bundelkand, came forward and liquidated the debt, and the Rajah being a minor, determined to assume the entire management of the country, till he should attain his majority. At the recommendation of the Governor General's Agent, in Bundelkand, a system of fiscal and magisterial management was adopted, of which the particulars will be found in the letter of our Correspondent. The basis of this arrangement, which immediately obtained the sanction of the Governor General, was the appointment of a Superintendent of the Police and the finances, with four European Assistants, who should be located in four central situations in the district, to collect the revenue, and superintend the Police. An opportunity was thus offered, in this unfettered district, of bringing to the test of experience, one of the plans of Police, which the recent discussions of the subject have elicited. An opening was thus presented for ascertaining whether the employment of European Subordinate Magistrates, in small Police 'arrondissements' would be found to afford an adequate remedy for the abuses of power, so constant, so invariable on the part of the Native officials, who are too far removed from the eye of control to feel their responsibilities. Lord Auckland immediately adopted the plan, with a feeling of benevolent zeal, and directed the experiment to be made without delay. Four Europeans were accordingly fixed in the district in such a locality, as to enable them completely to command their respective circles. We hear that the experiment has succeeded to admiration, and diffused universal satisfaction through the district. In a fiscal point of view, the success has been gratifying to Government, as the revenues are rising to their old standard, with the increase of public confidence. Nor has the success which has attended it, in a more important or magisterial point of view, been less conspicuous, or less grateful both to the governors and the governed. In addition to the observations in the letter, we have had the advantage of obtaining the unbiased testimony of those who have travelled through the country, since the new arrangement came into operation. Life, property and honour, are now considered secure; and the gratitude of a whole people has afforded the richest reward to those whose benevolence designed this plan of relief. The Assistant Magistrate can reach the limit of his jurisdiction in an hour, or an hour and a half's ride. The oppressed Native can walk to his office from the farthest village in the morning, transact his business, and return home by the evening. Justice is thus brought to every man's door, and the consequence is, that more crimes are prevented than are punished. The ubiquity of the Police does more for the well-being of the district, than fines and imprisonment. Public business is simplified, and justice has no time to grow sour from delay; and the endless mass of depositions, by which, in the British Provinces, Officers, both European and Native, are so blocked up, that they cannot see to do right, is, in a great measure, dispensed with. Discord among Zemindars, which in the Regulation Provinces so soon ripens into hostility, and ends so generally in an appeal to club law, is in Jalow nipped in the bud. The proximity of a European Officer, clothed with adequate authority, and impervious to corruption, produces an undefined, but very powerful feeling of respect and awe, which conduces, in no ordinary degree, to the conservation of the public peace.

If we look at the Regulation Province of Bundelkand, it presents us with the reverse picture. Take Humeerpore, for instance. There we find the worthy Magistrate, with his hands overwhelmed with business, situated at a distance of seventy or eighty miles from the extreme village in his jurisdiction. He is the sole representative of those principles of equity and justice, which the British Government is so anxious to adopt, as the rule of its administration. His Native subordinate officers are continually, in a contrary direction. Their object is to turn, to their own advantage, not to use it for the people; and their distance from the seat of authority, affords them the means of oppressing, and thereby impeding. The more unwieldy a jurisdiction, after the load of obligation thrown on the European Magistrate, the higher his dignity, and the weightier his responsibility, the farther is he removed from all chance of hearing the cries of the poor and the oppressed; the more is he obliged to depend, for a knowledge of his district, on the reports of his own officers. They find it their interest to obstruct the path to his presence; and to render himself accessible to the people, he has to maintain a constant struggle with the machinations of his subordinates. In Humeerpore, the Darogahs receive, if we are rightly informed, only a gold mohur a month. There are few who do not spend four times that amount. But we will not fatigue the reader with assertions. We will bring the case before him, by facts drawn from the Regulation and non-Regulation Province. In one of the Thannadary circles in Humeerpore, far from the eye of the Magistrate, the Darogah receives sixteen Rupees a month, and gives, according to report, Twenty Rupees a month to his concubine. On a recent occasion, his field wanted ploughing, and his subordinates were employed to press the cattle of the peasantry. A European passing through the village of his residence, enquired into the cause of this general discontent of the villagers, and on discovering the truth, advised them to apply for justice to the Magistrate. How can we, was their reply? He lives seventy miles off. If we proceed to his presence, we shall lose a month by the delay of the Court. How are our families to subsist during this time? How can we overcome the obstacles, which the Native Officers of the Court, who are the friends of the Darogah, will throw in our way? We must oblige them, or we shall be liable to punishment for a vexatious complaint. Who will volunteer to travel this distance, submit to the invitable delays of the Court? Our witnesses are as poor as we are. How are their families to subsist during their absence? If we cannot prove our cause; if we cannot even procure the removal of the Darogah, we must return to the jurisdiction of an irritated superior, who has a thousand means of oppressing us, within the limit of the law. It is better to put up with injustice, than in a vain attempt to obtain redress, to bring down severer calamities on us and our families.

A European was recently travelling through one of the new Magisterial Jurisdictions, in the Jalowa district, when a Native, with a club in his hand, rushed out and aimed a blow at him; he was disarmed by the servants, but in the scuffle, received some rough treatment. The villagers came forward, and assured the traveller, that the man was not in his right senses. Instead of being sent up to the Court, therefore, he was quietly suffered to escape. Some ill-designing persons, however, put it into his head to complain to the Magistrate. And the very next morning, to the traveller's surprise, a purwanah or writ, followed him with half a dozen officers of Police, to seize a number of his servants, who were alleged to have committed an assault. The matter was soon explained to the satisfaction of all parties. This fact will serve to shew the promptness of Magisterial interference in Jalowa, and the confidence with which the Natives resort to the Court. When we compare the ease with which complaints are carried up to these Assistant Magistrates, in the district which has been made the subject of the experiment, with the difficulties which necessarily attend complaints where one Magistrate is the sole European Officer in a vast unwieldy Zillah, it is impossible to suppress a wish that Lord Auckland would, on his return to the Presidency, sanction, at least in the Bengal district, the experiment which has succeeded so admirably in Jalowa.

EDUCATIONAL

The Committee of Public Instruction have had printed lithographed forms of certificates, to be awarded to those pupils of the Government Colleges and Schools, who have deserved such an attestation of their character and attainments. They are forwarded to the Local Committees, with a circular from the Secretary of the General Committee, which states the object of the bestowal of them to be, the encouragement of the students, by the hope of obtaining employment through the possession of such a testimonial, from gentlemen of rank and character, to the excellence of their conduct at College or School, and to the extent of their acquirements. The certificates particularise the parentage, age and residence of the student, together with the length of his attendance at School or College, his character for diligence in study and propriety of deportment, the honours and prizes he has won, and the various studies he has pursued, with the proficiency he has exhibited in them severally. A special examination is to precede the granting of a certificate; and it is to be signed both by the teachers under whom the pupil has studied, and the Members of the Local Committee, and such other gentlemen as have taken part in the examination. The measure is good; and there can be no doubt it will have a very beneficial influence. Put to give full effect to it, something seems to be required of Government. It would, of course, be absurd to think of promising employment to all who possess literary certificates; but it would be perfectly proper to declare certain appointments unattainable, except by those who hold such testimonials—which, however, every person should have a right to demand. Local Committees, may have pursued or not. Government of profiting, as it might do, by its own success in educating our Native youth. There is scarcely anything it needs more, for instance, than faithful surveys of estates; and they are needed as much by private individuals as by the Government. Now surveys might be furnished from the Colleges in almost any number, in a very short time, and the improved methods of surveying possess the peculiarly happy recommendation for India, of securing the accuracy of the work, whatever may be the moral character of the workman. Bribery cannot alter the relations between angles, lines and areas. Why, then, has not the Government taken advantage of the science taught in its Colleges, to put an end to the infinite frauds, public and private, connected with land measurement?

It is not to be desired, however, that the new race of Native youth should be imbued with the old spirit of place-hunting; which belongs properly to the reign of rapacity, when place is considered the only source of emolument, and the people of no consideration, but as the prey of corruption and oppression. Care should be taken to provide those we educate, with resources that will make them independent of patronage. When so much remains to be done for the improvement of our staple articles of commerce, and for increasing their number and supply, according to the boundless capabilities of our various soils and climates, it is high time we took pains to initiate the rising generation of intelligent Natives in the science of commerce, of arts and manufactures. Let their attention be directed to cotton, silk, sugar, indigo, and such things, and their thoughts of wealth and honour be associated with their cultivation. In proportion as it is, they will rise superior to the lick-spittle meanness of disposition, which is so prevalent in the country; and their hopes will be linked with the general prosperity of their father-land, and not with the continued prostration of the masses under the oppressions of the few.

We have been happy to learn, that the Committee of Public Instruction have been induced to relax in their exclusion of the Vernaculars, as the medium of instruction, in some, at least, of the Schools in the Western Provinces. The result is said to have been immediately beneficial. Yet we must have greater changes. Amongst our Contemporary Selections, will be found an extract from the Bombay Durpan, respecting the Vernacular Schools in that Presidency, which is highly deserving of attention. The defects of the composition are abundantly atoned for by the value of the matter. It is cheering to find, that the obstinacy of the Bengal Government, in favouring with exclusive support, the Anglicanists, is not to have a free and unreprieved course. We shall have, at least, the Bombay Vernacular Schools, and their effects, to hold up in contrast with the lame system of Bengal; and truth and experience will, in the end, carry the day. We shall feel greatly obliged to any of our friends at Bombay, who will favour us with an account of the Schools, in the Deccan, under the superintendence of Captain Candy, and also of those in Gozerat. What is their number—how are they located—by what means are they supported—in what esteem are they held by the people—and what influence do they appear to have?

Our idea of the value of Vernacular Schools in preparing the way for those of higher pretensions has lately received confirmation from a report, sent us by a Correspondent, of the Government School at Jessore. At that station three or four Vernacular Schools have been conducted under the superintendence of the Missionary, formerly connected with Serampore, ever since 1824: and besides the immediate good they have done, they have taught the people the importance of education so well, that the Government School is already attended ed by upwards of 200 pupils. The progress of the pupils appears to be fully as satisfactory as their number. The first class have got to the 24th Proposition of the First Book of Euclid, to Division of Vulgar Fractions in Bridge's Algebra, Proportion in Vulgar Fractions in Bonnycastle's Arithmetic, through a fourth of each of the Histories of England and Rome, through the Poetical Reader, No. 11, and as far as the 4th Rule in Murray's Grammatical Exercises. They have lately begun Goldsmith's Geography, and they can work nearly all the problems in Mollineux's Use of the Globes, both on the terrestrial and the celestial Globes. They are exercised also in Composition and Translation. This we take to be good work, considering that the School does not occur in the tables of the last Report of the Education Committee, as even in existence at the end of 1837: and great credit appears to be due to the Master.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH ENGLAND.—The report of the meeting which was held in Calcutta, on the announcement that our Mails had been left behind by the Steamer, and of the determination to which the President of the Council of India had come, to order the Steamers in future to wait for the Calcutta Mails, has produced a very lively sensation at Bombay, and called into vivid exercise those feelings with which every attempt to give this Presidency an adequate participation of the blessings of Steam Navigation, is viewed at that Port. The consequences of this equitable resolution, are represented as likely to be most disastrous. The Mails, it is said, will invariably be ten days later in their arrival in London. Whether this is likely to be the result or not, it is evidently considered a far greater calamity for the Bombay letters to be detained even for ten days on the way to London, than for the Calcutta Mails to be a whole month behind hand. The meeting, which was convened in Calcutta, is misrepresented as having been held at the instigation of the "Black Act Clique," and upon no apparently clearer foundation than that Mr. Turtton, who stood forth to do battle against the Act, which has been facetiously named Black, was among the most prominent speakers at the Steam Meeting. Our Bombay Contemporaries have never been more egregiously mistaken, than when they thus confound the advocates of two measures, which have no connection whatever with each other. The opponents of the Black Act consist of a party, respectable in point of talent, but which forms only a section of the community. The opponents of the system pursued at Bombay, of making Steam Communication subservient to the interests of one Presidency, comprise the entire community of the metropolis, and its dependencies; of all, indeed, who are affected by the self-interested views of Bombay. The grievance of the Black Act was considered by many to be altogether imaginary. The grievance inflicted on us by the exclusive Bombay system, is equally felt by all; and hence, on the occasion of the meeting, minor differences of opinion were merged in one universal feeling of opposition to a system of measures, detrimental to the general interests of the Empire; and the opponents and supporters of the Black Act were found, side by side, in the Deputation which waited on the President with the Address. We can assure our Bombay Contemporaries, that whatever differences of opinion may exist regarding the expediency of that Act, there is none respecting the conduct pursued by the Directors at home, in giving to Bombay the exclusive advantage of Steam Communication, and casting into the shade the interests of that Presidency which bears all the expense, which has paid for the stranded Semiramis, and for the half consumed Atalanta.

As it regards the inconvenience which may possibly result to Bombay from the obligation now laid on its Government, of detaining the Steamers for the Calcutta Mails, we do not see from what quarter relief can come. The Directors have determined to make Bombay the Steam Port of India, simply because this is the cheapest arrangement for the speedy reception of their despatches. On other interests they seldom waste so much as a thought. It is out of no pre-eminent love of Bombay that it has obtained the preference over Calcutta, but solely from that love of money, which, though the root of all evil, is still predominant in Lendenhall Street. While Lord Auckland continued in his eyrie in the mountains, and his despatches reached Bombay earlier from Simlah, than if they had been despatched from Calcutta, the arrival of the Calcutta Mails at Bombay in time for the Steamer was a matter of indifference to the Directors. But His Lordship will soon be in Calcutta, and his despatches must be transmitted from hence. The President in Council, therefore, has only anticipated, by a month or two, an order which the Governor General must have passed immediately on his return, and which, if he had neglected to do so, and the despatches for the Directors had been left behind on only one occasion, Lendenhall Street would have instructed "our Governor General in Council," to pass without delay. The Directors are better arithmeticians than the Bombay Editors, and will not be long in detecting the difference between a delay of ten days, and one of thirty.

Our Bombay friends are benevolent and discriminating. They have no objection that Calcutta, Madras and Ceylon should be admitted to share, in a larger degree, in the blessings of Steam Navigation, provided always that no step be taken which shall affect the paramount right of Bombay to be The Steam Port of India, and the Boat Post to be The Comprehensive Post Office of India. A plan is devised to give the Eastern Ports a full share of the privileges with the Western, it meets with the stern opposition. If the pre-eminence of Bombay be mainly a reef or two of privilege may be shaken out in favour of the other Presidencies. But the good folks at Bombay seem to have forgotten, that while Steam Navigation has been making the most gigantic strides, the road between Bombay and Calcutta has made no progress whatever; that it is still in a state in which eighteen days are often required to traverse it. The advantage which its local position gave to Bombay, has been neutralized by the progress of improvement in Steam Navigation. It must always be the object of the Directors, to land their despatches at the Port from whence they will reach the Supreme Government at the earliest moment. Three years ago, Bombay was that Port. Now it is not. The Great Western and the British Queen have done more than put Bombay and Calcutta upon an equality. They have turned the scale in favour of Calcutta. Letters sent from Suva by vessels of adequate power, would even in the months most favourable for land carriage, reach us sooner by a direct passage, than if they were sent to Bombay, to be dispatched across the continent; and in the rains, the shortest route by far between Suva and Calcutta is by sea.

We are sorry to remark that the predominant feeling at Bombay is still so narrow, exclusive and selfish, and so unworthy of men of large and liberal views. By the establishment of steam vessels from Calcutta to Aden, as to the Comprehensive Steam Port of India, at the expense of our Empire, Bombay would lose nothing but its monopoly. If we thought that the standing of Calcutta from hence to touch at Madras and Ceylon, and to form a link from Aden with the Bombay mails and passengers, we should see any advantage over Bombay, the claim of the place would be lessened in no small degree.

THE FAMINE AND THE COURT.—The despatch from the Court of Directors, relative to the famine, (the speech from the throne in Leadenhall Street, cannot be perused, without a feeling of astonishment that our Honourable Masters should ever have dreamt of requesting 'that it should be generally made known in India.' On the occasion of so overwhelming a calamity, it might have been expected that the Directors would have adopted such expressions of sympathy with the suffering people, and of cordial approbation of the benevolent measures pursued by Lord Auckland, as would have served to bind the Natives of the country to them in the bonds of a warm affection. But, unhappily, a cold heartedness pervades the despatch, which not only does violence to every feeling of humanity, but cannot fail to leave on the mind an impression, that there is no community of interest between the Directors and the people of India. The style of the despatch is as naked and awkward, as the sentiments are frigid and revolting. 'The Directors lament the deprivation and sufferings of the Native population.' 'The extensive loss of life is likewise much to be deplored'; that is, it is to be deplored equally with 'the excitement inseparable from such visitations.' What is this excitement, which is to be deplored as much as the death, by starvation, of half a million of people? There was no excitement in this country, except that of warm and animating benevolence; and this surely cannot be considered an object to be deplored. Do the Directors allude to the excitement created at home, as the calamity so much deplored? What, then, will be the character of that excitement when this despatch shall be read from the hustings?

'The amount of £1,000,000 sanctioned by you, as expended in the Agra division, for alleviating the distress, is considerable; and the sum you have directed to be suspended, (about this sum) which, we fear, must ultimately be relinquished, in order to relieve the unfortunate landholders and ryots from all anxiety on that account, is large in amount.' Why did not the Court at once generously set up to their character as Emperors of India, and acquaint Lord Auckland that the expenditure, however vast, had their most cordial approbation; that in the case of such a calamity, revenue was a secondary consideration? Why leave His Lordship to infer from the terms, 'the expenditure is considerable,' the revenue you have suspended, 'is large in amount.' Why did not the Court and the relief were begrudged? The Court could not have been ignorant that when a man is anxious to express his disapprobation of an outlay in the mildest terms, he usually says it is very large. Why should the Court express their fears that this revenue, which has been suspended, must be relinquished, especially when they state that 'nothing short of the relinquishment could relieve the unfortunate landholders and ryots from all anxiety.' Is it befitting the rulers of India publicly to proclaim through the land, that the measures which were necessary to relieve from anxiety of future evils, the poor sufferers who had survived this general calamity, were viewed as an object of dread or regret? We are deeply grieved that the whole tenor of this despatch should be of a character, calculated to alienate, rather than conciliate, the minds of the Natives; who cannot forget that 10 millions and a half sterling are annually remitted from the revenues of India to the Directors. Of one thing we are certain, that if such a visitation and desolated England, no Minister of the Crown would have ventured to insult the feelings, by putting into the mouth of his Sovereign so cold and unfeeling, as that which the Secretaries of India House has put into the REPORT ON BOOTAN, BY CAPTAIN R. B. PEMBERTON, EXECUTED IN 1838.—This volume of 212 pages forms a proper sequel to Captain Pemberton's previous Report on the North Eastern Frontier, which we had the pleasure of reviewing in September, 1836. The former volume gave a complete survey of Arracan, Cachar, Manipoor and Assam, and the regions to the east of them. In the present publication we are carried on to the whole frontier line north of Lower Assam and Bengal Proper, and made acquainted, as we have never yet been, with our neighbours in that direction. We are glad to see the Report on Bootan in the form of a book for the public, instead of an official communication for the use only of Government, as its predecessor was. And the difference induces us to suggest to Captain Pemberton, the importance of his now publishing his former Report for general use. A more interesting contribution has rarely been made to Indian Geography and Statistics; and its value has been greatly increased since it was first printed, by the actual commencement of the Tea cultivation in the regions it describes, and the plans now in formation for its extension on a scale corresponding with the demands of the European market. Yet that volume, every way so interesting, has been entirely lost to the world. Only a limited number of copies were printed for Government; and what was done with them, we know not. This, however, we do know, that when Mr. Montgomery Martin was preparing for the press, his volumes on Bengal and Assam, with all his access to the treasures of the Leadenhall Street Library and Records, he was totally ignorant that such a document as Captain Pemberton's Report existed. Nor is his ignorance to be wondered at, when we have found it shared by an eminent Executive Officer in Bengal, officially connected with the very regions which the Report describes. Perhaps it may be out of rule for an official document to be published without the express permission of Government; and there may be some squeamishness about laying the military details connected with the frontier before all the world, and our good friend Tharwadnee with the rest. If it be so, it would be easy for Captain Pemberton to recast his materials, and take the opportunity of bringing up the statements of population, revenue, and political arrangements to the present time; and then the volume would be his own. The merchants of Calcutta, and all who take an interest in the Assam Tea Companies, would consult their own interests by uniting to request Captain Pemberton to do as we have taken the liberty of suggesting, and guaranteeing that, at least, he should not be out of pocket by the undertaking.

The Report on Bootan consists of two parts. The first is historically and geographically introductory to the second, which narrates the circumstances of the Author's Mission to Bootan, and the information which was obtained in the course of it. The first Part is divided into three Sections. The first Section furnishes a brief history of the relations between the British Government and Bootan and Tibet. In 1773, after Bengal had been acquired by the English, the tributary, the Rajah of Kooch Behar, was compelled, by the aggressions of the Booteens, to seek the assistance of Government in repelling him. His cause was taken up effectively; and his enemies were driven back to their own mountains. In their turn they applied for support to the Teesboo Lama, the Guardian of the Grand Lama of Tibet; who, in consequence, despatched a letter to the Governor General, Warren Hastings, requesting a cessation of hostilities against Bootan, and the restoration of the lands of which she had been deprived. A treaty of peace was, in consequence, entered into and ratified on the 25th of April, 1774; and to confirm the amity, Mr. George Bogle, of the Civil Service, was deputed in May that year, to the Court of the Teshoo Lama. He reached his destination in October, and remained there till the following April. A singular proof of the confidence he had won was given by the Teshoo Lama, in entrusting to him a considerable sum of money, to be expended in the erection of a temple on the banks of the Hooghly, immediately opposite to Calcutta, for which purpose a grant of land had been made to the Lama by a Sumud of the British Government.

In 1779 the Lama died at Pekin, where he enjoyed high consideration. In 1781 the decease of the Lama was communicated to the Governor General, in the expectation of his sympathy with the national sorrow: and soon after, intelligence having been received that the new incarnation of the spiritual Chief had been discovered, Captain Turner was deputed, in 1783, to convey the congratulations of the Governor General on the auspicious event—a strange commission for a Christian Officer to bear. The reception of this Mission does not appear to have been so cordial as that of the former. No British Mission has since then found its way into Tibet, and none into Bootan till Captain Pemberton proceeded thither last year. The fact is, that in 1791, the Goorkhas having invaded Tibet, the aid of the Chinese was called in against them. The Chinese, in consequence, drove back the Goorkhas to their own country, and brought them into subjection; and then openly assuming the sovereignty of Tibet, which had for years been virtually subject to their rule, they established a line of military posts along the whole southern frontier of that country. By this means all intercourse between the British Government and Tibet was closed. The communication with Bootan has also been exceedingly limited. In 1815, the late Mr. David Scott, when Judge in Rungpore, deputed a Native Officer of his establishment, with the consent of Government, to settle some boundary disputes with the Deb Rajah of Bootan; and since Assam has been added to our territories, such disputes have multiplied, and at last the necessity arose for Captain Pemberton's Mission.

The Second and Third Sections of the first part of the Report contain a description of those tracts along the frontier of Bootan and the British Territories, by which the two States are brought into collision, and a narrative of the chief occasions of dispute. These tracts are called Dooras—that is, dooars or passes. They form a narrow slip of territory extending along the foot of the lower ranges of the Bootan Hills, from ten to twenty miles broad, and about 220 miles long, from opposite the Dihonsee River, in Assam, to the Teesta, in Bengal. The Dooras are eighteen in number; of which seven are on the frontier of Assam, and eleven on that of Bengal. Captain Pemberton believes that the whole tract was originally inhabited by the Kooch tribe; but it is now occupied by as various, unsettled and lawless a set of beings as ever border immunities and raids produced. It is perfectly natural that the State in the plains, should claim all the territory up to the foot of the mountains, which are its physical boundary: and it is equally natural that the Mountain State should covet a slice of the fertile plain, as a farm for the produce of those commodities which the mountains will not yield; and that they should avail themselves of their Native fastnesses, for harassing the plains, until permitted in some way to take what they need. Hence, in proportion as the paramount power in the plains was feeble, the encroachments of the mountaineers were larger and bolder. It so happened that the British Government on taking possession both of Bengal and Assam, superseded governments, the Mahomedan and the Assamese, in the last stage of imbecility: and having other things to think of, they recognized the status quo of the frontier as what was to be held sacred. The Dooras on the Bengal boundary are wholly under the Bootan authority; and all disputes about their limits were settled in 1834 by Lieut. Bredin, in conjunction with Bootan Officers, appointed to act with him for that purpose. The Dooras, on the Assam boundary, are held in various ways. Two of them are subject to British and Bootan rule alternately for six months every year: five others are always under Bootan authority, but pay a small tribute in recognition of the British sovereignty: and two more are always under the British rule, but pay a fixed composition for Black Mail, to certain independent tribes of Booteas and Duphas, to purchase exemption from their raids. The disputes concerning the Dooras have arisen partly out of arrears of tribute, but much more from the protection given by the Bootan authorities to numerous gangs of robbers, who lived by their forays upon the timid inhabitants of the plains, and shared their spoils with their protectors. It was not to be supposed, that the British Government would suffer their people to be so dealt with. They remonstrated in letters to the Deb Rajah, which the border Chiefs took care should not reach him; and then obtaining no redress, they followed the ravagers of their country on special occasions into their own hills, and fought and took them; and they attacked the Dooras themselves, till the Bootan Government would come to reason. The stopping of the supplies could not be succeeded from the Deb Rajah; nor could he bear it. Hence he was the first to renew diplomatic negotiation; which has given us the opportunity of obtaining the knowledge of his State, acquired by Captain Pemberton. Of that, however, we must postpone our notice for another week.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 4.

—The Herkara of this morning publishes extracts of letters from Malacca to the 19th of August, which give, we believe, the latest intelligence in town. The Commissioner Liu is stated to have actually arrived in the vicinity of that town, with most of the Hong merchants, and a considerable body of troops. His object was, of course, hostile. The commendation of Capt. Elliot, that the ladies should embark, had been only partially complied with; but the proscribed merchants, whose continued residence at Malacca was one of Lin's causes of complaint, had determined to embark immediately. Some of the vessels in the harbour had been fully equipped for action, in case the Chinese should begin an attack.

—Farther intelligence from Bombay gives us a hope, that the damage caused by the fire to the Atlanta, may be repaired in three months. It is a singular coincidence, that the Semiramis, a condemned Steamer, should be coming out of dock, just as the half burnt Atlanta was ready to go in.

—The papers state that letters from England, by the last steam mail, announce it, as probable, that Lord Minto would succeed his cousin, Lord Auckland, as Governor General of India, on His Lordship's retirement. In this case, the highest office in India, and the most important post in the gift of the Crown, will have fallen to the same family, on three successive occasions in the space of thirty-five years.

—Our ex-Deputy Governor. Col. Morrison, returns to England on the Seringapatam.

—Important intelligence has been received from the Persian Gulf. Letters from Beyrout, of the 4th of August state, that Ibrahim Pasha had received orders from his father, to stop the advance of his army, and that he had accordingly halted within the limits of Syria. This will remove all pretence for the occupation of Constantinople by the Russians. Intelligence has arrived, to the effect, that a party from Persia, which removes for the present prospect of a second siege of Herat, are Persians. Insurrections of a serious nature have occurred in several cities; and the consequence in the Capital, at the head of which were the King's brothers, and the people of the city. The King had been obliged to take refuge in his own Palace, where he was a close prisoner.

— The last arrangements published in the papers regarding the troops which are to remain at Cabul, are, that the Cavalry return across the Indus, and that Sir Willoughby Cotton is to command the Infantry and Artillery, which are to remain.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 1.

— The papers mention the gallant conduct of a Mahomedan, at a fire which occurred the day before yesterday in Calcutta. A child was asleep in the house which was enveloped in flames; the Mahomedan rushed in at the risk of his life and rescued it.

— The Admiral in H. M. S. Wellsey, accompanied by H. M. S. the Lorne, has left Madras, and proceeded to Bombay, to await the arrival of orders from home by the Overland Mail, to direct his future proceedings as it regards China.

— A letter from Sir Charles D'Oyley from London, is published this day for the information of the subscribers to the Bust of the late Mr. Palmer. He had gone to the studio of Sir Frederick Chantry, who shewed him a long line of casts, and asked him to point out that of Mr. Palmer, which he was enabled, from its great resemblance, to do without difficulty. The Bust is to cost 300 guineas, and Chantry has promised to give his earliest attention to it. We are happy to find that Sir Charles D'Oyley's good taste has led him to adopt the simple inscription, John Palmer; any addition to the name would be redundant. The noblest monument in Westminster Abbey, is that which contains the plain inscription, 'John Dryden.'

— Mr. Halliday has furnished the Journals with a copy of the official papers connected with the improved cultivation of Cotton. The most important of these documents, is an able minute by Lord Auckland, in which the subject is fully and ably discussed. The most valuable information is, that the Court of Directors have made arrangements for procuring from America, persons duly qualified for the purpose of instructing and superintending the Natives in the cultivation of Cotton, and the proper mode of cleaning it by machinery. In Louisiana passes the following just and gratifying encomium on the labours of the Agricultural Society of Calcutta:—"That Society I consider the Government and the community to be under the highest obligations, and I would here say that I would, with perfect confidence and satisfaction, entrust the employment of the expected workmen, with the application of any expenditure which may be sanctioned by the Government, and the guidance of the further experiments to be now entered on, to their general superintendence."

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2.

— Intelligence has been received from the camp at Kurmool. The band of Rohillas and Arabs, to the number of about five hundred, who had obtained possession of the person of the Nabob, had taken up their station in a stone burying ground. A detachment of European and Native troops was sent against them, under command of Col. Dyer. He offered them honourable terms, the payment of all their arrears, and a safe conduct to their respective homes, with all expenses. After a long parley, they rejected the offer, and in terms of insolence, dared the English to attack them. After three hours had thus been wasted, the word was given to commence the attack. After seven or eight rounds of round and grape had been fired, and also a smart discharge from the musquetry, the bugles sounded the advance, and the position was speedily carried at the point of the bayonet, and the person of the Nabob seized. The resistance was very spirited, if not desperate. The total number, killed and wounded, was about twenty. Two officers were killed in the enclosure, and Lieut. Col. Wright, commanding H. M. 39th, was severely wounded. The most daring Chiefs of the enemy, and a vast number of men, fell on the occasion.

— Letters from Marco of the 20th of August state, that forty chests of Opium, which had been purchased at Singapore for 160 rupees the chest, had been sold at 600 Rupees, thus yielding a profit of 440 rupees 35 and 40,000 Rupees on this sale.

— Intelligence from Herat to the 12th September Persian frontier; indeed, the incoming Persia had assured us of this.

Colonel Stoddart was still a prisoner at Bokhara. Capt. Conolly was penetrating into Seistan, to feel the pulse of the Chiefs there.

— The little Rajah of Lumbok, a Malay State, has followed in the footsteps of the Emperors of China, the Kings of Siam, Cochinchina and Ava, and proscribed Opium!

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4.

— The Englishman states it as a rumour, that the Hon. Miss Eden comes to Calcutta before Lord Auckland, and may be expected in all January.

— A New Journal, the Legal Observer, has just made its appearance in Calcutta. The chief object of the paper will be to record the decisions of the Supreme Court; but it is not intended to exclude whatever may be drawn from other legal sources, for the instruction of practitioners. The price is fixed at a Rupee a number, or four Rupees a month. The conductor is said to be Mr. Johnstone, who was recently connected with the Editorial department of the Englishman.

— The Museum of the Asiatic Society has been robbed. Some thieves made their way up stairs, and taking several Nepalese swords, and that of the late Begum Sumroo, hampered off the gold mountings from the velvet scabbards, and decamped, leaving them in the compound.

— Notwithstanding the depressing intelligence received from China by the Myaph, one hundred and forty-five chests of Opium were put up at the Exchange on the 1st instant, and sold, after some spirited biddings, on the part of Natives, at an average of about 430 Rupees the chest. The quantity of Government Opium, which is likely to be brought to sale this season, will not fall far short of Twenty Thousand Chests. At Five Hundred Rupees the chest, we believe it would pay cent. per cent.

— An Iron Steamer has just been launched at Bombay for service on the Indus. She is a hundred and thirty feet long, eighteen feet beam, and when fully supplied with coal, will not draw more than two inches and a half of water. She is called the Comet, and is described by those who have experience in such matters, as one of the most elegant and compact vessels in India.

— We regret to learn that Mr. James Sutherland, Principal of the Hooghly College, has been obliged to proceed for his health to the Cape, from whence he may possibly be required to go on to England. Government has refused him any portion of his allowance during his absence; and in case of his being constrained to proceed to England, has declared that his situation will be considered vacant.

— Four Military Officers proceeding to the Upper Provinces, having passed Monghir, and arrived at Derrapore, one of them went out to shoot dogs, and deliberately aimed at a dog lying near the door of a cottage. The dog was killed by the discharge, and also an unfortunate Native woman of about thirteen. The gentlemen have been brought into Bhagulpore.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 5.

— The Bombay Gazette just received, contains the following singular sentiment: "It must be perfectly evident, that an European is no more qualified to administer justice to the Natives of India, than he would be to subsist wholly on the food of the people of India." The character of the Natives of Bombay must be vastly different from that of the Natives of Bengal; for here it is perfectly evident, that to leave the Police in the hands of the Zemindars, would be to deliver the country up to plunder.

— The Bombay papers, after having fixed first the 20th, and then the 23d of October, for the arrival of the Zoroaster, now state that she can hardly be expected before the 27th, in which case the probability is, that the Calcutta letters of the September Mail will not arrive till after the Mail has been despatched from hence on the 10th of this month. The Overland letters which were conveyed by the Zoroaster Steamer from Bombay, on the 21st of the month, and were despatched the next day to Damascus. All the previous packets sent by this route had reached Beyrout in due process of time.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6.

— Letters have been received from the ARMY OF THE INDIA, on its route to Bamean, of date the 4th October, from which we learn that its destination had been changed, and that it was to proceed to Kholloom, in Tartary, where Dost Mahomed is gaining strength. This place is only fifty hundred feet above the level of the sea, and is expected, therefore, to offer a milder climate. The troops are to winter there. The cold on the Hindoo Coast is already very severe, as it freezes during the greater part of the twenty-four hours.

—The Bombay Government has appointed a Committee to draw up a scheme for the establishment of a Medical College and Hospital, similar to the Institution which has conferred such blessings on Calcutta.

—The dispute with Joudipore having been adjusted, the equipment has been broken up, and the troops have begun to return to their own cantonments.

—We learn with great pleasure, that an Association has been formed at Calcutta, for the purpose of seeking the conversion of the Jews in the metropolis, whose number is said to exceed a thousand.

—The latest accounts from Kurnool state, that the number of the Rajah's troops who were attacked by the British detachment, was nearer twelve hundred than five hundred. They also add another to the list of officers wounded, Lieut. Schacterloo, of the Engineers.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

BOMBAY VERSACULAR SCHOOLS.

The progress of the Native Schools of Government in the Decan and Gujrat must be an object of interest to all friends of Education. These Institutions must afford the best and most efficient mode of disseminating useful practical education to the mass of the population, till at least a better means can be provided to secure that important end. Indeed, whatever may be done at the Presidency through the agency of English Schools and Colleges, it may be doubted whether they can ever be made to impart any considerable share of knowledge to the thousands of people living in the districts—no English School in each provincial capital is disseminating useful practical education to the masses under the present economical arrangements; and one school in a district containing an area of from 6,000 to 10,000 square miles can but indifferently instruct the numerous population scattered throughout its wide extent.

The course of the Native Schools, it must be confessed, is extremely limited. The acquirements of the masters resulting no higher than the elements of Grammar, Geography and Mathematics, so far as those branches can be learned from versacular translations, the instruction which they can give to their pupils is still more confined in extent and imperfect in kind. Yet in many cases it is more than sufficient to people placed in ordinary situations of life,—to cultivators, mechanics, manufacturers and tradesmen; and a man possessed of a rank far higher in point of intellectual improvement to most of the present carious, and the highest Native Officers of Government.

Great deal may be done to improve the existing system of Native Schools; and on this subject we would invite the attention of those who are interested in the subject, to the letter of our Native Correspondent, which appears in another column. It is well calculated to open the eyes of those who are infected with the mania of anglicizing the country.

We are happy to observe that the Government is doing all in its power to raise the character of these schools. Since the appointment of Captain Candy, as Superintendent of Education in the Decan, the Marathe Schools have been greatly improved: many idle school masters have been reported to Government and brought on the situations of reduced salary; and a regular system of periodical examinations has been established, which cannot fail to promote the raising of these Institutions. Several new schools have been ordered to be found in large towns; and four have lately been established at Ponn.

The schools in Gujrat have not the benefit of a regular European superintendence. They are, however, now and then visited by the Judicial Commissioner and the Lord Bishop, and a very desirable arrangement has lately been effected in the reports of three functionaries. It having been represented that many of the masters were not well qualified to conduct their duties, all of them were ordered to come turn to Bombay and to place themselves under the Native Education Society. They have been here for the last three or four months, and having received instruction in those branches which they had formerly learned imperfectly, or not learned at all, a number of them are going to return to their stations by permission of Government. Among those who were found qualified to conduct their duties, several, we understand, distinguished themselves for their proficiency; and that the School Master of Surat (Doorgaram) showed a degree of knowledge which has not hitherto been acquired by any one of his class, having exhausted all the sources of scientific instruction which are available to a native student in the transactions of mechanics, chemistry, natural philosophy. We understand that the Government has presented him with a reward of 100 Rs. with a view to mark its approbation of his activity and diligence.

Such men as his under proper superintendence and encouragement, will succeed to a great extent in disseminating a knowledge of the first principles of science amongst their pupils, and thereby creating a taste among them, and the people in general, for a more perfect acquaintance with the different branches of learning which can be thoroughly studied solely through the medium of the English language.—Bombay Durpan.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

During the past week the various services connected with the Anniversary of the General Auxiliary Missionary Society to the London Society have been held in our city. On Sabbath, the 27th instant, two sermons were preached at the Union Chapel, Dharanata, on behalf of the Institution. That in the morning by the Rev. F. Tucker, of the Baptist Mission Society, from Acts xxvi. part of 17th and 18th verses. "Unto whom now I send thee? To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified, by faith that is in me." That in the evening by the Rev. W. P. Lyon, from Leviticus xxv. 8, 9, 10. On the evening of the same day the Rev. G. Pickens preached at the Gooly Bazar Chapel.

On Wednesday evening, the 30th, the Twenty-first Anniversary of the Auxiliary was held at the Union Chapel, Dharanata. The meeting opened with singing and prayer by the Rev. W. Morton. The chair was occupied by J. Hawkins, Esq. C. S.—From the report, an abstract of which was read by the Secretary, we gather the following

SUMMARY.

Since our last report the Mission has been materially strengthened by the arrival of Mr. G. Goggerly and Mr. Goggerly, accompanied by the Rev. James Kennedy, Rev. Messrs. E. Root, M. D., and F. Somers, M. D., with their wives. Mr. Goggerly, whose health has been much improved by the voyage and visit to England, has resumed his charge of the Native Church at Krishnapore. Mr. Kennedy has been permanently appointed to Benares, where he has been diligently prosecuting his studies of the Hindoostani. He has already commenced his labours amongst the heathens. Dr. Root is pursuing his study of the Bengali language in view to labour amongst the people of the same country. Dr. Somers has proceeded to Benares for the purpose of acquiring a correct acquaintance with the Hindoostani, for the purpose of laboring amongst the Mussulmans and up-country Hindoos in Calcutta.

The Committee are happy to inform their friends that the Rev. M. Hill has arrived in safety and much improved in health in the father-land. He contemplates a speedy return to this country. It is with the deepest regret that we record the early failure of the health of Mrs. Lyon, the wife of our esteemed brother, the Rev. W. P. Lyon, of Benares. Mr. Lyon has been obliged to quit Benares and will be obliged to proceed immediately to Europe. May He in whose power alone it is, show our friends the wisdom of this painfully mysterious dispensation. They are, we are confident, accompanied by the sincere prayers and warmest sympathies of all their brethren. Mrs. Piffard and children have, through divine mercy, been brought back in safety and with renovated health to this land of sickness and change. Miss Thompson, formerly of the Central School, has proceeded to the Society's station at Mirzapore, for the purpose of conducting the female school at that important station. Mr. Cussons, the assistant Missionary, formerly at Moorshedabad, has been located at Benares. The Native Christian Church at Krishnapore has been placed under the joint pastorate of Messrs. Goggerly and Morton, Mr. Campbell having given up his time entirely to the duties connected with the Christian Institution and occasional preaching to the heathens. The appointments are now as follows: Messrs. Piffard and Leonard at Banakal Choke; Messrs. Goggerly and Morton at Krishnapore; Messrs. Campbell, Boss, Bradbury, De Bult and Dr. Root at Calcutta; Mr. Mundy, Chinnath; Messrs. Paterson and Lessel, Berhampore; Messrs. Bayers, Sherman, Kennedy and Somers at Benares, and Mr. Mather at Mirzapore.

The native agency remains as in the former report. The number of Christianization and other agents, connected with the London Society in Northern India is at present as follows: European Missionaries, 18; East Indians; 1; Native Preachers and Catechists, 12; Heathen Sirkas and Bundits, 25; Native Churches, 6; Communicants and Inquirers, 230; Schools, 20; Scholars, 1800; Orphan establishments, 4; 15th Schools, 3.

The London Society continue to deserve the best thanks of the Committee for their encouraging and successful efforts to supply the means for carrying on the great work in which they are engaged.

• A statement is here given of the Funds, and other interests of the Society already appeared in our pages, on one of the Friend of India.

• allotmentaries, Schools, which we omit as follows, July List, p. 461.—Ed.

To J. M. Voe, Esq., the Committee would tender their best thanks for his liberal donations to the Society during the past year; as well as in former years.

It is the painful duty of the Committee to place on record the removal of one of their long and steady friends, A. S. Synner, Esq., for many years an active, consistent and useful member of the Committee. His end was peace.

While the Committee revert with feelings of thanksgiving to the apparent efficacy of their own Mission, they cannot but rejoice with their brethren of other and kindred institutions in the very large accessions of strength which they have been permitted under God to receive during the past year. Oh that the Spirit may be given in an equal proportion to the increase of labourers, yet, a thousand-fold more.

The Committee cannot allow this opportunity to pass without urging most strenuously on all the followers of Christ, the importance of increased subscription to the cause of Missions in this city. We alone in this city have by God's blessing seven brethren who are every way qualified to preach to the people the message of life; but the very fact that so large a number are capable of fully engaging in this blessed work, necessarily involves a very considerable increase of expenditure, in providing both additional places of worship, and means for carrying on the various new and enlarged plans of operation recently adopted by the Committee. It would be a very material benefit to this, as well as to every Society, were the ground on which the Chapels are erected, purchased instead of being rented. Any aid for this special purpose, and for the erection of new Chapels, will be most thankfully received.

Finally, the Committee would entreat from all sections of the Church, that which is the best and most valuable donation, the prayer of faith that the word of the Lord may run and be glorified amongst us, even as it is in many other places, until the news of salvation spread from pole to pole, and Jesus reign from the rivers to the ends of the earth.

"Shall like a sea of glory"

The following resolutions were moved and seconded by the gentlemen whose names are appended.

Moved by the Rev. W. Yates, of the Baptist Mission, seconded by the Rev. H. J. Houghton, of the American Mission, Resolution I.—That the Report, an abstract of which has now been presented to the meeting, be adopted and circulated by the Committee.

Moved by the Rev. M. Wenger, of the Baptist Mission, and seconded by the Rev. T. Boaz, Resolution II.—That this meeting, convinced by a painfully practical and lengthened experience, as well as by the unerring word of God, that all human efforts, however well directed, will be unavailing in the spread of the Gospel without the aid of the Spirit, would humbly and devoutly unite in beseeching the Lord Jesus, the Head and Advocate of his Church, to remove from our midst those hindrances to the reception of the blessings promised to the Church by the last days.

Moved by the Rev. T. Smith, of the Scotch Mission, and seconded by the Rev. G. Goggerly, of the London Society, Resolution III.—That this meeting desires to thank God for his continued goodness to the Church in making her the instrument of accomplishing any spiritual good amongst the children of men, and especially that measure of success which has attended the labours of this and every kindred Society in India during the past year.

Moved by J. W. Alexander, Esq., and seconded by the Rev. D. Ewart, of the Scotch Mission, Resolution IV.—That the following persons be requested, in the name of the Lord, to conduct the affairs of the Society for the ensuing year:—Rev. T. Boaz, Treasurer, Secretary and Collector.—Committee, Messrs. J. Bartlett, M. Cockburn, A. Grant, G. C. Hay, J. M. Voe and H. Woolaston;—together with all the Ministers or Missionaries of the Society in Calcutta.

The meeting closed with singing, after which the benediction was pronounced.

There was a very respectable attendance, and a spirit of seriousness appeared to pervade the assembly. May the year, on which the friends of the London Society have entered, prove a very conspicuous one for the outpouring of the Spirit of God and the increased conversion of souls. We regret to find that the Auxiliary is indebted to the Treasurer.—Christ. Adv.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

2 to the Editors of the Friend of India.

Editor, Sir,—Some of the most able and enlightened men who have had experience in this country, have declared themselves in favour of the little measure now before you. I shall consider it my duty to leave things in statu quo? I hold, that this is a stand still to suit our of the subject in succession spirit of improvement, or we shall certainly fall back to a point which we do not contemplate. It cannot be denied that the revenue of the country is falling off, and that in some parts of our dominions whole villages are deserted; and while the higher class of Natives at the three Presidencies are beginning to ape European manners, and to question the motives and conduct of their Governors, the mass of the people remain in the same state of ignorance and low morality, that they were when we took possession of the country.

The same causes which have produced this state of things (but which it does not belong to my present subject to discuss), will continue, and will continue in operation, and the end must be, either that the country will fall into such a state that we shall be but too glad to leave the Natives to shift for themselves, or they will become discontented, and inclined to rebel against us.

But, setting such arguments aside altogether, surely no liberal or generous mind would wish to retard the improvement of the Natives, solely for the promotion of our own selfish and pecuniary interest. By taking possession of this country, we have entailed upon ourselves serious obligations, and we can only fulfil them, by an honest and faithful endeavour to improve the condition of the people in every possible way. I will, therefore, take it for granted, that it is not the wish of any party that we should stand still, and proceed to the consideration of the second course alluded to, namely, that of anglicising the country.

This I hold to be an equally impossible undertaking with the first. It appears to me, that in whatever country a large majority are governed by a small minority, the tendency always is, and always must be, when amalgamation takes place at all, for the minority to merge in the majority; not the majority in the minority. When a European family locate themselves in the interior of this country, what is the result? Do the Natives, or their children, by mingling with them, learn either their language, their habits, or their customs? Not at all! Most European families will be aware, by personal experience, that the very contrary takes place. The Europeans themselves, in some instances, but at all events their children, become familiar with the Native language, habits and ideas; and in the course of a few generations, if none of the parties ever left the country, the descendants of such Europeans would not only be Natives by birth, but almost entirely so in language, manners, habits and opinions.

The tendency which I have here insisted upon, is clearly exemplified by the course of events in Great Britain. When the Normans had conquered Britain, did they find it an easy task to transform the Saxon inhabitants into Normans? Far from it; and to this day, the Saxon language is the basis of the dialect of the country, with words from the Norman, and other languages, added to its vocabulary. The same is the natural tendency of things in this country! If education is not forced into an unnatural channel, the Native language will always form the basis of the dialect of the country; while English, and other words, will be added, as a superstructure, which is already beginning to be the case, as regards revenue terms, &c. This tendency appears to me to be still more clear from the course of events in Scotland, Ireland and Wales. Notwithstanding the intimate connexion between those countries and England; notwithstanding the similarity in the tastes, habits, manners, feeling and institutions of the people of these countries; notwithstanding the identity of climate and complexion, even to this very day, the amalgamation of the people of those countries is not completed. There are many places at this day, in Scotland and Wales, where the English language would be of no more use, as the vehicle of instruction, or communication with, the lower orders, than Latin or Greek. Doubtless, this will not always be the case; but when we take into consideration the length of time which has elapsed since the commencement of the experiment, the similarity between this people who have been the subjects of it, and the favourable circumstances of every description under which it has been tried; and if, with all these facts before our eyes, we are to make the same experiment in this country, where the circumstances are totally different, and the difficulties ten times as great, both in number and in magnitude, I confess that I look upon the general education and improvement of the people as postponed indefinitely. I do not deny, that if we could place ourselves in the same position which the English people occupy, with reference to Scotland, &c., that we might eventually succeed, but not till after the lapse of an immense length of time; and in order to succeed at all, we must place ourselves precisely in the same position which the people of England occupy with reference to those of the neighbouring countries. We must become part and parcel of the people of the land; we must settle among them, (not at the great towns only, but through all the interior of the country,) with the intention that neither we, nor our descendants, should ever return to the country of our birth; we must live among the people, and identify ourselves with them; we must eat with them, talk with them, walk with them, marry them, and give to them in marriage; and I would ask, is there any likelihood of this? As well might we expect oil to coalesce with water. The country has now been for some time open to settlers, and yet we do not see the slightest advance towards so familiar an approximation. The difference of colour alone seems to me to be quite sufficient to keep the two races distinct. I do not say that it ought to be so. I do not say that because the Almighty has made the one race white, and the other black, they ought to be prejudiced against each other. I speak only of what is, and not of what ought to be; and I say that there is no prospect whatever of the complete identification of the two cases. But supposing that we had all the requisite advantages for the prosecution of the plan, (which we never can have,) we should still be forcing things out of their natural course, postponing the improvement of the people indefinitely, and we should be compelled to support our system by legislative enactments, making English the only language for the transaction of official business, and making the knowledge of it an indispensable qualification for the obtaining of office.

I have now only the third course alluded to, to consider, namely, that of educating the Natives in their own language, and fitting them for the administration of higher offices in the State, with a view to the relinquishment of the Government of the country into their own hands at some future period. By this plan we should not offend their prejudices; we should give them the benefit of their own language, and such knowledge as they may already have acquired; we should remove the stumbling block cast in the way of education, by the necessity of the acquirement of a new and difficult language, before any progress can be made; we should allow the improvement of the people to go on in its most natural and easy channel, and our success would be far more speedy, general and effectual, the chief difficulty being the translation of a sufficient number of works, and the engagement of competent translators and teachers; but when these objects were once secured, the system might at once be brought into active operation, and in a very few years the most satisfactory result might be expected.

If, then, it is our intention that the Natives should, at some future period, be enabled to govern themselves, and to be interested in the welfare of their country, it is but just and fair, that we should give them the benefit of education in their own language; for it appears to me, that it would be the height of selfishness, and a proof of the greatest prejudice in favour of every thing English on our part, if, by measures of compulsion, we should endeavour to anglicize the country. When it is our intention eventually to leave the Natives to themselves, in which case their acquirement of English would be of little or no use to them, their labour would have been lost, and they would, probably, fall back again into the use of their own language.

It is the duty of a wise and benevolent Government, to take upon itself the responsibility of national education; but instead of doing this, (if English is to be the medium of communication,) we throw the responsibility upon the Natives themselves. We say to the people, Learn English, and we will instruct you. To which they might with justice reply, You are our Governors. You have taken our revenues into your possession, and entailed upon yourself the responsibility of our welfare and improvement. Give us instruction in our own language, and we will avail ourselves of it; but by laying the basis of your plan upon the English language, you are, apparently, offering us a boon, while you are, in fact, depriving us of the power to avail ourselves of it.

We might learn a useful lesson upon this subject, from the conduct of our Missionaries in this country. It is their desire, that a knowledge of the Christian faith should be as widely diffused as possible; but in order to accomplish their intentions, they do not say to the Natives, Learn our language, and we will then teach you something which it much concerns you to know, but they translate the Scriptures into a language with which the people are familiar, and thus make their prejudices, language and acquirements subservient to their purpose.

Our grand object, therefore, should be, according to the foregoing arguments, to instruct and improve the Natives, by means of their own language, so as to fit them for the duties and responsibilities of Government; and so that when we resign the country into their hands, we may be enabled to say with confidence, that we have fulfilled our sacred trust; and that, despising all selfish interests, all partial feelings, and all prejudiced views, we have sought, in an honest and straightforward course, the welfare of our Native subjects.

The object of this Essay being only to show the propriety of education in the Native tongues, it does not belong to my purpose to advert to those other measures of improvement which are essential to the well being of the people and the country; and I shall, therefore, content myself with remarking, that in order to render any system of education effectual, it must be followed up by other measures of a enlarged and liberal character, such as lighter and more equal taxation; the appointment of Natives to higher offices in the State; and the establishment of a system, by which the people may be allowed the management of their own local affairs, and the appointment of their local officers, (subject, in the case of the higher grade of officers to the approval of Government.) These measures would tend to give them an interest and a stake in the welfare of the country; to enlarge their ideas; to enable them to obtain redress for partial or unjust taxation; to remove or equalize their burthens; to increase their feelings of self-respect; to elevate their character, and would, in the end, (as I am persuaded,) prove most beneficial both to the Government and the country.

I remain, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A FRIEND TO EDUCATION.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—A brother of yours, that is to say, one bearing the same name, namely, a Friend of India, having frequently conversed with me on the internal government of this country, put into my hand yesterday the last number of your very valuable journal, and requested me to commit to paper my thoughts on your article on the late proceedings at Kurnool. That you may be put in possession of the opinion of one of a class which you have proscribed, I have done so; and trust to your candour to give them publicity. You state that a Mahomedan Government is like rotten wood, on which nothing good or useful can be carried; and you soften down your own Government's misrule by stating, that it is like all Governments, capable of improvement. Now, Sir, though all must admire your patriotism in uniformly propping a Government most oppressive to this people, I think the strong contrast you have given the two Governments is scarcely fair. You found your arguments on the recent events that have transpired at Kurnool. I answer you by saying, that because the Pethan Prince is, as you say, prodigal, headstrong, ignorant and tyrannical; much given to cock-fighting (a Christian vice) and strong waters, (an introduction into this country of your Christian Government,) it is not just that you should bring his sins to bear against Mahomedans generally. For if you glance over the history of Mahomedan rule, you will find that the majority of Princes were more blessing to this country than curses; and that the country,—I mean not the aristocracy, but the masses,—the cannals, were in far more easy circumstances under them than they are now. One tyrant is better than many; he is more easily disposed of; like the autocrats of Russia, he is subject to sudden death; and that circumstance alone makes his Government more popular than your's does. You are guilty seldom of any act of open violence. But you are—
You are guilty of death by starvation, or to be more exact, perhaps, of withdrawing the means of livelihood, precluding on from being assigned before the bar of nations as murderers. But you are not the less murderers, because people's lives are taken from them by your rapacity, and under the sanction of your laws. Murder is a harsh word—you start at it. Then I will call it prematurely sending to the grave, thousands from whose limited lives your nation enriches itself. You do not cut throats, and get your own throats cut in return; but you inflame the inward brutes—the Natives bleed inwardly till they die!

Oh, Mr. Editor, that I could lead you through the villages of this beautiful country, and in disguise show you the weeping, drooping homes of the Natives, borne down by the hand of the oppressing Police; and that in disguise I could take you through the Courts of Justice furnished by your countrymen; and the victims to your system of rule would show you that I do not exaggerate when I assert, that the country is becoming desolated by those hands whom you extol. Sir, I know that you will say that this is declaiming; and that I have given no logical proof of your Government being better than the Mahomedan was. But I will give you an opportunity of knowing that justice does not mark the course pursued by your Justices, by calling from a mass of cases that I am possessed of, a few that have, within the last fortnight, come under my observation.

In a jail a Jumadar employed three prisoners to make a hut for him near the jail. One fled to the next field, but was retaken. The Jumadar was discharged, fined 50 Rs., and imprisoned for three months. The same Magistrate who inflicted this punishment, had employed more than 50 prisoners for 8 months in cultivating oats for his horses. Some prisoners broke from jail heavily ironed. They were pursued, and three in cool blood cut down—one died—no investigation was made as to the perpetrator of this murder. A Civilian lived in a house, before which was a tank—a Native went there to relieve nature, and was ordered to be seized by the master. He fled, but outstripped his pursuers. The Civilian mounted his horse and followed him. He chased him to the river, into which the man jumped and was drowned. A party brought the case to the notice of the Magistrate, who issued a perambush for the Civilian's apprehension—accommodated the prisoner with a chair, and easily disposed of the case, by dismissing it. A few nights after siman (a Christian) was drunk in the streets, laying in the middle of the road; a poor Native was driving his Ekkhapat, and in the dark drove over the man's head. The Ekkhapat was seized and thrown into jail, where he now lies. Both cases under one of your Christian Magistrates. Mr. Editor, I could fill columns with similar anecdotes that I could also prove; but these oppressions under law will suffice, when I assure you that they are of daily occurrence. You boast of a free press. Your press is as much free as the Natives are. There is not one, let me tell you, who does not rather wish for the support of the Civil Service, which forms a large Section of the Newspaper reading public. A service, in passing I may observe, of whose practice I have not now time to speak, but the policy of whose constitution I will assert is a curse to the country. Mr. Editor, your free press men are not bad at heart, but how number one, nevertheless; and let no one of your countrymen lay the flattering unction to his soul, that the Natives are represented by Calcutta papers, and that because the atrocities lately committed, (not immediately) by your enlightened Magistrates and learned Judges are not published, that they do not exist. This is only preliminary to a series of letters I intend (D. V.) writing, and I will furnish you with dates, facts, &c., of innumerable cases that I am in the course of collecting; and which I shall furnish to the British India Society in London, but which will have more weight, provided they are first published here, and run the galleys of investigation. I am a candidate for Government employ, otherwise I would give my name. I am not rich enough to practise abstract virtue, by refusing the wages of infidelity, or they should not have the opportunity of refusing, as a recompense, the services of,

Your obedient servant,

A MAHOMEDAN.

Our remarks on this singular letter will appear next week.—Ed.

To the Editor
Sir,—While one feels, and the evils attend

the Friend of India.

our Police system are so manifestly increasing, it is strange, passing strange, that no remedy should be applied, though for several years past various measures have been contemplated, and much official correspondence, to the great waste of Government stationary and the valuable time of public functionaries, has taken place. The great increase of daring robberies, allied to it, is a late number of your hebdomadist, loudly calls for the immediate attention of the Government to this important part of their duty, however deeply occupied they may be with matters of external Policy; and it is devoutly to be wished for, that ere long some energetic endeavour will be made to check so great and growing an evil.

Much time has been thrown away in the discussion of theories proposed for the improvement of the Police, while the difficulties attending their adoption have prevented any of the proposed improvements being reduced to practice. I hope any fresh discussion, by the issue of long lithographed circulars, which produce nothing but a mass of jarring opinions, from which none of the higher dignitaries of the State have time to extract what is useful, will not now take place, as that would put off the day of reform ad infinitum; but beg, through your columns, to call the attention of our lawgivers to a new system, not only of Police, but also of Judicial and Revenue administration lately introduced by an Officer of great experience and known ability; and as it has already been in operation for about a twelvemonth, its practical working might be easily ascertained by the Government or Indian Law Commissioners. Indeed, the readiness with which the Governor-General sanctioned the plan, shows His Lordship's conviction of its advantages, and the confidence he placed in the judgement of the Officer who proposed it.

The great disorder which manifested itself in the territory of Jalown, a Native State, subject to the Political Agency of Bondekhund, under a female regency, (the present Chief being a minor,) induced the Governor-General to assume its direct control, and to place it under the management of Mr. S. Fraser, the Agent in Bondekhund, subject to whose authority, Lieut. Dunbar, formerly an Assistant in the Saurashtra territory, an officer highly qualified for the duty, was appointed Superintendent.

The Superintendent, under the general control of the Agent, exercises the powers of Magistrate and Collector; but to remedy the evils of too extended a jurisdiction, and to relieve the Superintendent of minor details, four Assistant Superintendents, from the Unconventured Service, have been appointed, with the sanction of Government. These Officers possess ample powers, both in the Judicial and Revenue departments, and each has a district of moderate extent—about 400 square miles—allocated to him, in which he resides.

The control of the Police is entrusted wholly to the Assistant. Police Chokees are stationed throughout the district, at each of which a Jumadar, instead of Thannadars, presides. As the power of making preliminary investigations in criminal cases, and the discretionary authority which, as a necessary consequence, is vested in them, is known to be a source of much oppression in the hands of the Thannadars, the Police Jumadars in the Jalown State are deprived of the authority, the higher duties of a Thannadar being entrusted to the Assistant, while the Jumadars are considered in the light of Officers of similar denomination, stationed at outposts subordinate to the Thannadars in the British Provinces. The duty of the Jumadar and his subordinate Officers, is to guard against the occurrence of crime; and in cases of murder, theft, and other heinous offences, to secure the offender and forward him, without delay, to the Assistant; also to report the crimes committed within the limits of his Chokee. The Assistant, on receiving the report, makes due investigation, summoning such parties and witnesses as may be necessary, the Police Officers conforming to the orders he may think proper to issue in such case.

All visu voce examinations are made by the Assistant, who takes down the depositions in writing, and investigates the charges. Should the offence not be established against the prisoner, he is authorized, in all cases of whatever nature, immediately to discharge him; and in cases of conviction, his power extends to passing a sentence of six months' imprisonment, with or without labour and irons; and fine to the amount of 200 Rs.: thus all cases of inferior magnitude are at once disposed of by him. In graver offences he is required to submit the proceedings for the orders of the Superintendent, detaining the prisoner alone in custody; the witnesses and prosecutor being allowed to return to their homes.

Many are the advantages which this system possesses over that which obtains in the British Provinces. In the first instance, the people are saved from exactions and annoyances of the Native Police, which is a matter of such loud complaint. Secondly, Justice is brought nearer home to all suitors; for the limited extent of an Assistant's district affords every facility for a speedy dispatch of business; whereas the great space over which a Magistrate's jurisdiction extends, is a source of the greatest inconvenience to parties and witnesses, not only from the distance they have to travel, but the delays unavoidable in the Court of an Officer who has such a quantity of business thrown on his hands. Thirdly, The Superintendent or head functionary, being relieved from minor duties, has time to attend to the more important concerns of his office, while he is at the same time enabled to keep a vigilant eye over his subordinates, being authorised to receive appeals from all orders of the Assistants. Fourthly, An Assistant, by his weight in the scale of society and extent of Magisterial powers, and by being enabled promptly to visit any part of his jurisdiction, where his presence would be serviceable, is enabled to infuse vigor into the administration of Police duties, and thereby oppose an efficient check upon the commission of crime.

Besides the advantages above enumerated, the appointment of Assistants, from the powers vested in them in Revenue matters, renders their services highly valuable to the State, and advantageous to the agricultural classes. Their authority in settling disputes among the Zemindars, which is chiefly done by punchayet, not only facilitates the collection of Revenue; but serves, in a great degree, to prevent the occurrence of affrays, a crime for which it is lamentable to see such numbers of useful members of the community immured in the jails of the Upper Provinces.

Should you think my communication deserving of a corner in your pages, I shall, in another letter, shew how the Jalown system might, without any increase of expense to the State, a point which in these times of economy is considered of paramount importance, be gradually introduced into the British Revenues; but fearing that this letter has already extended to an objectionable length, I shall conclude for the present, and remain,

Sir,
Your obedient servant,
REFORM.

RELIGIOUS.

DR. WARDLAW'S MISSIONARY REMINISCENCES, at the Anniversary of the London Missionary Society.—I was thinking, while listening to it, how very small a proportion of the intelligence embodied in that Report, would thirty years ago have filled our minds with a thrill of wonder, delight, and thankfulness. I remember very well the time when the first translation of the Testament into the Bengalee language, executed by the Missionaries at Serampore, was brought to Glasgow—why, it was held as a kind of era in the Christian churches. It was a novelty with us of the Glasgow Missionary Society, who met together on the occasion when the book was laid on the table; one occupied the chair, the remembrance of whom awakens all the emotions of filial affection in my own bosom; and an eminently excellent and now sainted minister of Christ, with the books lying on the table before him, and, while all around him were in tears of delight, offered up to God the grateful thanksgivings of that meeting for the sight then presented—although it was a sealed book to them, yet it was a book which would open the treasures of divine truth to millions. We have now ceased to wonder when we hear of new translations of the Scripture; and it is a delightful thing, Sir, to recollect that the very instrument of our enlightenment, is one of the evidences of the progress we have made, and of the extent to which our labours have been blessed by the God of all grace. We now can hear of translations with hardly an emotion of surprise, it is what we have got so much accustomed to; but the subject still fills us with delight.—Bengalee Missionary.

FRENCH PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.—The following article on religious proselytism appears in the Journal de Commerce:

"Of all the faults committed in Algeria, the most pernicious, without contradiction, is the organisation of ecclesiastical proselytism. The establishment of an episcopal seat at Algiers, a political expedient to please the court of Rome, and to serve the Archbishop of Paris, could have no other object in view than to convert the Mussulman population. It was quite certain that this establishment was not required for the spiritual wants of the army, and the Catholic colonists, for whom the Archbishop of Aix and a few chaplains would have sufficed. If any doubt could have existed, as to the intentions of the party who obtained this concession from the Government, it would have been dispelled by the terms of the bull of institution. The Pope has formally declared the design of converting the infidels. Thus, our soldiers have descended upon the coasts of Algiers as true knights of the cross, to establish the church in Africa, baptize the Belouids, and renew the very pious and very absurd expedition of St. Louis. The propaganda is in full activity. It is exercised upon Mussulmans and Jews, by the direction and care of the Baroness Viatard, who, under the colour of a work of charity, is performing the mission of conversion. She has been up for recruits even in the harem of the ancient Bey of Constantine, and we all very well know what a noise was made about the conquest of the Oudjak Aïcha. These conversions have spread alarm in the Mussulman families, who see themselves threatened in the person of their women with aspects of profanation which, in their eyes, is the most infamous of degradation; for the woman who is faithless to her religion is, in their opinion, more impure than if she were guilty of adultery and prostitution. Entire families of Arabs, who had established themselves in the plain of Mitidja, and who had sought under French domination an asylum against the persecutions of Abdel Kader, have fled before our missionaries. The chiefs of the enemy have taken advantage of this circumstance to rally against us all the tribes with whom we wished to dissolve themselves under the influence of mild and tolerant government. By religion only, and the skilful management of the resources of fanaticism, Abdel Kader has sometimes been able to bring his camps, not his states, under a common discipline. He has not always succeeded, but if the Bishop of Algiers and his Apostolic militia be left to their work, there will soon be between the allies and the foe, for want of an Arab nation, a Mussulman church, one and indivisible like the Catholic church in Africa. The Bishop of Algiers is the most powerful auxiliary of Abdel Kader. It is he who teaches the eloquence of the Prophet; it is he who leads the faithful into the infidels—a new war is about to commence in Africa—a war of religion; and all that is not wanting to complete our crusade, is to establish the inquisition as it existed at Goa. It is said that the mission of Frayles to Algiers, who are struggling there. This is true; but it is a singular abuse of words in confounding the propagation of ideas with religious proselytism. Ask the old companions of General Bonaparte what sort of propaganda they exercised in Egypt; whether they thought of preaching the gospel and establishing a church in Alexandria in virtue of a Pope's bull. The French missionaries there were, in the first instance, the members of the Institute of Egypt; they are now merchants, physicians, engineers, and officers, charged with the instruction of the Arab troops in European discipline. They have no desire to baptize the population of Egypt; they confine their mission to the conversion of the people to our arts and habits. The English, who never omit the employment of religious proselytism when they have the opportunity as the means of conquest and civilisation, have comprehended that this means, although efficacious with insular savages, would be pernicious in an old civilised country, and one in which the religion of the people is deeply rooted. They owe their success in India to the spirit of toleration. It is only by toleration that we can succeed in Africa. The idea of our becoming the apostles of Catholicism among the Mussulman population is the wildest and most ridiculous of all ideas. The first efforts of our missionaries have already produced the most fatal results; we do not give them two years to effect the loss of the colony."

CANONIZATION BY THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.—It is, we believe, scarcely known in this country, that the religious monarch of Russia, the Emperor Nicholas, has himself by a new high authority as supreme head of the church of Russia, canonized a saint; but such is the case; and the person so canonized was the Chaplain of Peter the Great, who refused to hold any intercourse with his imperial master, when, in imitation of the fashion then prevailing in Europe, he decorated one of his imperial galleys with the statues of the Russian gods and goddesses. The reverend chaplain, true to the well-known aversion to images of the Greek church, declared that his imperial master had encouraged the sin of idolatry; and as he continued firm in his interpretation of the arguments set up by the Emperor, the people considered the chaplain a confessor of their faith, and ever afterwards honoured his memory as that of a saint. The present Emperor was advised by his ministers to honour the feelings of the people, and to establish a canonization in respect to him as supreme head of the church, by the canonization of the saintly chaplain. The Emperor said to have laughed at the proposal when first made to him, and afterwards, perceiving its policy, as part of the mystery of state, he convened a synod of the ecclesiastical dignitaries, and commanded them to proceed to the canonization, which was completed accordingly—and the chaplain is now a saint in the Russian calendar, by the will of the Emperor.—Inquirer.

SCIENTIFIC.

STEAM SHIPS IN THE CLYDE.—The whole river Clyde is, indeed, at this moment, a scene replete with interest to the man who is interested in the progress of steam navigation. We were shown a large ship called the Achilles, of about 1,000 tons, floating in the basin of a Mr. Steele, at Greenock, which is to contain engines of about the size of the British Queen, and which we were also shown in the establishment of Messrs. Laird and Co. The Achilles is a noble and symmetrical vessel, rising to a great height out of the water, yet standing as stiff as a castle; and her engines are framed in a colonnade of eight Grecian-Doric columns of gigantic proportions, carrying an entablature which connects the two engines with much elegance. I should have imagined that this vessel was designed to cross the Atlantic or Indian Oceans, at least; but, to my astonishment, I found her merely built as one of the magnificent line of packets between Liverpool, Greenock, and Glasgow, to ply in concert with almost equally fine vessels called the Actæon, Engle, Commodore, &c.—vessels so large that the dock-gates of Liverpool (to their shame be it said,) cannot admit the largest and barely the others! The Achilles will form a most interesting experiment in regard to power. The proportion of 500 horse power to 1,000 tons, is a proportion unequalled in the world, and will decide some important questions of general interest.

There is another experiment of equal interest at present in progress in the Clyde. The Five King is a vessel of very peculiar construction, built for Mr. Ashton Smith, of Wales, as a steam yacht. The midship section of the vessel is very peculiar, being a plan of Mr. Smith's invention; and the water-lines adopted are those of which you have repeatedly given diagrams, in your accounts of the British Association, as having been proposed by Mr. Scott Russell, to admit of the vessel's passing through the water with least resistance. This experiment is the fourth which has been made avowedly upon this form of water-line, the two first having been made by Mr. Russell himself in 1824-33. This is the largest yet tried, the vessel being 800 tons, and the engines 220 horse power; and although the proportional power is much less than what we find to be in general use on the Clyde, yet this singular vessel is still the fastest vessel afloat. We were told by a gentleman who was on board at one of her trials, and who had previously been prejudiced against her shape, that she performed, without having set a stick of canvas, the measured distance, in rather fresh weather, of 15 miles in 54 minutes; being about 15 miles an hour through the water. And the same vessel has since gone from Liverpool to Greenock, and from Greenock to Liverpool, each way in less than 15 hours, each way without canvas, in fresh blowing weather, being about a rate of 15 miles an hour. This vessel we saw lying alongside the British Queen; and although she seemed very distinctive in comparison, yet she appears elegantly shaped; and the part of her above water has the form of an excellent sea-boat. We were told that she has also a great capacity for carrying cargo, and would have been repeatedly bought as a merchant steamer, had not the owner wished to retain her as a yacht. We were also shown a large steam ship at Greenock for the India Steam Navigation Company, by the Cape of Good Hope; and several large steam frigates, now fitting up for government; besides preparations for large steam ships for the Halifax and London mail communication; but I must not extend further the notice of these preparations.—Athenæum.

AIR AND VAPOUR LIGHT.—[Abridged from the Mechanics Magazine.]—The merits of this invention are the production of a brilliant light at a less expense than any thing hitherto known, of more intensity than ordinary gases, consequently producing more light with less flame, and from substances universally to be met with at little expense. The substances from which this light is obtained are the fluids resulting from the distillation of tar, either vegetable or mineral; and that produced by the coking, or destructive distillation of coals, resin, argentine, pitch, and various bitumens, animal and other bad oil, and most of the inflammable bitumens, &c., which are formed into vapour in a sort of retort, and then mixed with a sufficient quantity of oxygen from the atmosphere. The light, it may be said, may be itself, for it is in that way the supply of vapour of the hydrocarbon, which, being mixed as it is formed with a sufficient quantity of air, at a proper temperature, produces the light. This mixture of oxygen and vapour takes place in the burner, which also answers the purpose of a retort; so that the whole process of making a light similar to that is performed at once. This burner is so constructed as to take in an easy adjustment, a certain and invarying quantity of air, whereby a regular quantity of vapour is formed;—the portion of air being admitted by means of a cock, the which is in consequence tion, unless from a very great alteration in the degree of temperature, which would have but a trifling effect, and which can be instantly corrected. The hydrocarbons are contained in a reservoir connected with the burner, and are allowed to flow into it to a given height: an overflow is practiced, either in the reservoir, or the burner itself, to prevent the possibility of any material rise of the fluid in the burner, which would cause too great a production of vapour, and require a larger quantity of air, or produce smoke, or still more serious consequences; that the overflow can be dispensed with, if the fluid be made to rise from an intermediate reservoir, by the means known and practiced in oil lamps, &c. The air is introduced by means of a small tube, which passes through the fluid in the burner, and is thus forced up an inverted tube fixed to the top, to receive a certain degree of heat, and then returns down upon the fluid to mix with the vapour, afterwards to escape for combustion. The air is supplied to the different lights by means of pipes in the same way as gas, through which it is forced from a reservoir or feeder under a pressure of about half an ounce on the inch; or when the lamps are made portable the self-acting air feeder can be placed in the bottom of the lamp, or compressed air used with proper arrangement.—Ibid.

GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY, June 10.—EGYPT.—The personal narrative of the Pasha of Egypt from Cairo to Fozzigo, on the Blue Nile, in 1858-59, Translated from the Turkish and announced by Dr. Bowring.—Leaving Cairo in a steamer on the 13th of October last, the Pasha and his suite, including several European engineers, &c., ascended the course of the Nile as far as the estuaries at Es-suan, which they reached on the 29th, the vessel having only grounded once at Atfalah, about seven hours above Cairo. Embarking here in a dahshyah, as the steamer could not pass the narrow, they passed Dongolah, and proceeded on to Assubuk, where they landed, and crossed the desert of Haggadib, reaching the Nile again at Jebel Raizan, and thence went to Khartum, at the junction of the White and Blue Rivers. Stopping here for a few days, the party proceeded by Wad Medinah and Senaar to Roseires, where they arrived on the 20th December, and remained a fortnight. On this part of the route a great quantity of birds were met with—guinea fowl, wild geese, storks, pelicans, ostriches, &c., about the desert of Haggadib, they slept the first night at Farnuto; the second at Jeli; the third at Kayar, and on the fourth day, the 18th January, reached the mountains and village of Fozzigo, on the west bank of the river. The Pasha remained some time here, and gave orders for building a house for himself, and magazines for provisions and ammunition, on an eminence nearly surrounded by water, on the opposite bank of the stream, and for securing the continuance of the gassas, or slave hunts, and set at liberty a number of prisoners taken at Korlofan. From Fozzigo the Pasha advanced to Fazanago, whither Khosra Effendi and Messrs. Lambert and Horvati, engineers, had preceded him, to examine the district and search for gold dust. After having explored the torrent Khor-el-Wall from its source to the mouth, and ascertained that the sands are equally rich throughout its whole course, he descended, on the 31st January, from the mountain of Faganago to the plains, and selected the junction of the Khor-el-Wall with the Bahr-el-Azrek as the site of a town, to be named after himself, Mohammed Ali, in which 1500 families from Fozzigo are to be located, to work the gold mines. After having received the neighbouring Sheikh, and urged them to cultivate the ground, and to send their children to Khartum for instruction, the Viceroy departed on his return. At Khartum he gave permission to the Christians to erect a church; at Dongolah he proclaimed the freedom of trade in Indigo, which this province and Berber produce in great quantities; and leaving M. Lambert to make a report upon a projected railroad across the desert from Abu Mohammed to Koruska, and another on the formation of a canal between the White River and Korlofan, on the order to furnish water to irrigate the land, he sailed on the 15th of March the cannon of Cairo announced to Egypt the return of the Viceroy, after an absence of five months. The Pasha, knowing the interest felt by Europeans in the discovery of the sources of the White Nile, determined to send an expedition for that purpose, consisting of three dahshyahs, with a chosen crew of sixty officers, and the command of three khalfi officers of his fleet; this party departed Cairo on the 20th September, 1858—when at Khartum, in February, 1859, on his return from Fazanago, the Pasha inspected this small flotilla, and thinking that it might receive annoyance from the negroes who, armed with lances and arrows, inhabit the banks of the White River, he added four more dahshyahs to three which he had first appointed, and also gave the protection of 500 regular troops, being the 1st and 2nd commands M. Thibaut and Sulciuan Kashed, who both possess considerable knowledge of the river; favourable wind having sprung up, the Pasha directed the flotilla to proceed to examine a portion of the river, afterwards to return to Khartum, and lay in a year's provisions, and to be prepared to set out on their voyage after the rains.—Ibid.

TRAVELLERS.—We learn that Mr. D'Abadie, the dis-distinguished African traveller, is about immediately to leave London for Abyssinia, to join his brother. Recently, too, the Parisian Institute has received a communication from M. Combes, the companion of M. Tannier, whose travels were reviewed in this journal (No. 563), announcing that he is on the point of commencing another African journey, and requesting instructions. To this we may add, that in the section of Astronomy the Academy has elected M. Lionville, in the room of M. Leffraucis Lalande.—Athenaeum.

MICKLETHORPE.

SIR JOHN LEMAN.—The following obituary of the late Sir John Lemau, who was not long since a humble frame-work-knitter, in Nottingham, appears in the Nottingham Journal. The deceased had succeeded in making good his claim to the title, but had not obtained possession of the estates.—On Wednesday, the 5th inst., at Cliffe House, near Wakefield, Sir John Lemau, Bart., aged 39 years. He was the 3rd baronet in succession from Sir William Lemau, Bart., of Portlath, Herefordshire. We regret to record the death of this baronet, whose indefatigable labour of mind and body in a just cause has shortened his days. He has for the last six months been sinking under the great anxiety of mind which his case naturally produced; and though he was attended by three eminent physicians from Wakefield and Leeds, he gradually sunk, and died at the very time his labours were being crowned with success; his case having passed through the House of Lords, the House of Commons, and he received the signature and seal of the Queen, and he had only to go to London to "suffer recovery," but which his failing strength would not permit. His next heir, Edward Godfrey Lemau, will have comparatively nothing to do in order to obtain possession of the immense property. Sir John's dying request was, that every person who had lent him money should be speedily paid; which request his executors will see punctually complied with as soon as possible. He was interred on Monday at Sandall, near Wakefield.—Christ. Adv.

CORDIALS AND CORONERS.—About a fortnight since, Mr. Wakley was called to hold an inquest on the body of a person who had died, we believe in the neighbourhood of Saffron-hill, in consequence of drinking a large portion of gin. One of the jurors, who was a teetotaler, remarked, that gin and other strong liquors were the cause of half the sudden deaths that happened; and that if the principle of teetotalism were generally practised, deaths would be far less frequent, and taxation would be reduced by perhaps one-half. To this Mr. Wakley, it is said, assented; observing, "I think intoxication likely to be the cause of one-half the inquests that are held." Mr. Bell, the clerk to the inquest, observed, that the proportion of deaths so occasioned was supposed to be three out of five. "Then," said Mr. Wakley, "there are annually 1,000 inquests in the western division of Middlesex, and according to that ratio, 900 of the deaths are produced by hard drinking. I am surprised that the legislature, which is so justly particular about chemists and druggists vending poison, is not equally so with the vendors of gin, which appears to cause such a dreadful waste of human life." Another affecting case occurred last week. An inquest was held upon a public house on the body of a female who had died suddenly in a fit of intoxication. Mr. Wakley is reported to have said on that occasion, "I regret that we are so often obliged to hold such serious inquests in public-houses." A remark having been made about gin-drinking, the coroner said, "I have lately seen so much of the evil effects of gin-drinking, that I am inclined to become a teetotaler. Gin may be thought the best friend I have; it causes me to hold annually 1,000 inquests more than I should otherwise hold. But, beside these, I have reason to believe that from 10,000 to 16,000 persons die in this metropolis annually from the effects of gin-drinking, upon whom no inquests are held." Since I have been coroner I have seen so many murders, by poison, by drowning, by hanging, by cutting the throat, in consequence of drinking ardent spirits, that I am astonished the legislature does not interfere. I am confident that they will, before long, be obliged to interfere with respect to the sale of liquors containing alcohol. The gin-seller should be made as responsible as the chemist and druggist. And I think it is right the publicans should know that even now they are, to a certain extent, responsible in the eye of the law. If a publican allows a man to stand at his bar, and serve him with several glasses of liquor, and sees him drink till he gets intoxicated; and if that man should afterwards die, and a surgeon should depose that his death was accelerated by the liquor so drunk, then would the publican be liable to be punished for having aided to bring about that death."—Temperance Intelligence.

STAGE TRICK.—Our mention of the Parisian theatres naturally introduces an extract from that strange record, the Gazette des Tribunaux,—a cause sufficiently whimsical, not, however, unique, which was tried on the 3rd of this month, before the Cour Royale of Paris. It appears, that during the management of the Theatre Ambigu Comique by M. de Cœ-Caupenne, he entered into a treaty, "offensive and defensive," with one M. Mennevier, who agreed to furnish, for the use of his theatre, the required quantity of support in the shape of a corps of claqueurs. M. de Cœ-Caupenne was succeeded in the management by M. Cormon and Cournot, and the same treaty was acted on under their dispensation. M. Mennevier received his sixtieth to twenty tickets of admission as usual, and, as usual, his directions at which of the scenes he was to laugh—at which tracasseries he was to be enthusiastic—at which in short of public he was to circulate the murmur of gratified sentiment. One positive order on the part of the manager to his independent friend, among many others produced in evidence, was, "Chouffez ferme ce soir." It appears, however, that M. Mennevier became lazy and extortionate, or M. Cormon and Cournot economical: in short, the applauding machinery, after working irregularly for a while, stopped, and the claqueurs came before the Court, to sue for redress, and the compulsory fulfilment of the treaty, so far as concerned his privileges. The Cour Royale received the evidence, laughed at the diplomatic correspondence between the high contracting parties, and decided, that M. Mennevier, having practised a dishonest trade, was not a fit subject for legal protection. The claqueurs, in short, lost his cause.—Athenaeum.

THE TURKISH AFFAIRS EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM THE REV. J. A. JEFFER.—"The news respecting Turkey must have been very interesting to you of late. The unexpected death of Sultan Mahmood, the entire overthrow of the Turkish army by Ibrahim Pasha, the delivery of the whole Turkish fleet by its commander Abdu Pasha, to Mahmud Ali, together with the doubtful and very precarious state of the Turkish empire. These are subjects which must interest every man, but particularly the Christian, who looks on three things as preparatory means for the restoration of the Jews to the land of their fathers, their successful conversion to Christ their Messiah, and the ushering in of the millennium.

"And what will you say, my dear Brother, when I tell you, that there is now more expectation than ever on the part of the Jews, that the time is at hand when they shall return to the beloved land of their fathers. A Sir Moses Montefiori, a brother-in-law to the late Baron Rothschild, of London, an eminently rich Jew, has now travelled through Palestine with the sole purpose of ameliorating the state of his nation. He has given away large sums of money to those Jews who are poor in Palestine. I have my accounts from good authority, a converted Jew, Sir Calman, who is now here, and has just come from Syria; Sir Moses has obtained permission from Mahmud Ali to establish five banking houses at Alexandria, Cairo, Damascus, Herson, and Aleppo, in connection with which hospitals and asylums, &c., are to be established, and I hear the Jews already look upon this gentleman as their deliverer. He has guaranteed five millions of dollars for this establishment to Mahmud Ali; and they being established we shall soon see the Jews flock to Palestine; this is considered here as a most important event. Sir Moses wants the Jews to engage in agriculture, and proposed to assist them by all the means in his power. He is going to send out implements of agriculture from England, and will give them money to purchase cattle, horses, &c. The land he will take either by lease or purchase. Mr. Calman informs me, that there are already two villages exclusively inhabited by Jews, in Palestine, one near Baffi, and another near Lebanon. Sir Moses has returned to England, and will communicate the result of his visit to the rest of his brethren there. We shall, doubtless, soon hear something more about this interesting subject."

"In connection with this striking sign of the times, we ought not to overlook the wonderful improvements in navigation. Two years ago it was quite a serious undertaking to go from Smyrna only to Palestine, and you had usually to embark in a miserable Greek or Turkish pilgrim ship, and expose yourself to all manner of inconvenience and hardship. Now you can go with perfect ease and safety on board a fine Steam in four or five days, whereas in the former, a passage was not accomplished before six or eight weeks. And there is now a complete line of Steamers from Smyrna to Constantinople, and from thence through the Black Sea, and the Danube, as far as Ulm, into the very heart of Germany. A short journey of three days conveys you from thence to Basel or Heidelberg, or another line of Steamers communicating with London. Then the Steamers from India to every part of the Mediterranean. What could facilitate the gathering of the outcasts of Israel more than these swift messengers? Only think, the Scotch Kirk has sent out a deputation to inquire into the state of the Jews, both in Asia and Europe, with a view to open missions among them. Two of the numbers of the deputation are now with us, and (we have passed on). Dr. Keith, the man so celebrated by his writings on the prophecies, is one of them, and slept a night in (the very room) in which I am now writing. My dear Brother, I consider it of importance to give particular attention to the subject of claqueurs, if it were only for this one reason, as being calculated to lead to a faithful and prayerful frame of mind, and at the same time to show that we have to expect respecting our mission particularly, and independent of the political state of the world, and of these countries led every observant man to expect great revolutions? Let the present infidel powers of Europe, (England included, as regards her present Government) endeavour to patch up things, and to keep Turkey from falling to pieces; they will not be able. The crescent is waning to rise no more, though the Turks try to be more religious now, than they ever seem to have been. They endeavour to retrieve their fortunes; this they openly say. Want of attention to their prayers, &c., is considered by many as the cause that their empire is sinking. A fortnight since an Imam here undertook to recommence the same warfare as his false prophet, and drew the sword. He collected several hundred Turks for this purpose, and intended first to kill all Frank. His plans were soon discovered, and he was executed. They butchered devoutly; every one that is suspected of rebellious intentions is taken forthwith and made over into the hands of the executioner. In Constantinople, they say, after the accession of the present Sultan, the Bosphorus was seen crowded with dead bodies. They take them to the upper part of the city, where there is a tower on the water's edge. Whoever enters into it returns no more.

The present Sultan is but a boy of sixteen, apparently of no talents. All is carried back, as far as possible, to the old style. There is no form nor courage left among the Turks. Ten days ago a false report was spread in Smyrna of a revolution; the whole town was thrown into confusion; the Turks fled from the Christians, and ran up the Castle Hill, and the Christians fled from the Turks and betook themselves to sea. We were just in town, and I never saw such a scene before. All were running, but upon asking the reason, nobody could tell why! Revolutions may be expected, particularly in Turkey in Europe, and there is no power to prevent them.—Christian Intelligencer.

2nd regiment native infantry—Ensign H. H. McCallin, from 23rd March to 10th April, in extension, to enable him to join.

Mr. W. Smith, on suspension from the rank of Captain in the 10th regiment of native infantry, has leave of absence, from the 24th October to 22nd February, 1930, to visit Mysore and Ponnagur, on his private affairs.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 23rd September, 1930.

The Karnaul station order of the 4th instant, appointing Lieutenant Interpreter and Quarter Master C. R. Gwarkin, of the 20th regiment of native infantry, to act as station staff, on the departure of Captain Grant to Ferozepore, and until the arrival of the division, is confirmed.

The following orders are, with the sanction of the Right Honourable the Governor General, confirmed:

The Hapur district order of the 20th ultimo, directing the Deputy Commissioner of Oudh at Ajmer to hire 1 rider, 10 workmen, and 1 horse complete, during the absence, on service, of part of the permanent magazine establishment.

The Nussersind station order of the 24th ultimo, directing the commissariat department to hire, for the sick left in Nussersind on the march of the 20th and 4th regiments, 1 cook, 1 brewer, 1 sweeper, 1 porter, and for the sick of the cavalry and artillery, 1 shop coolie and 1 barometer. The Commander of the forces is pleased to make the following appointment:

Engineers.

Lieutenant R. B. Smith to be Adjutant.

The undermentioned men are transferred to the Town Major's list, and appointed to the situations specified against their names:

Sergeant Thomas Means, after European regiment, to be Sergeant Major, and staff Sergeant James Willshire, of the 2d company 34th battalion of artillery, to be Quarter Master Sergeant, to the depot battalion at Ferozepore.

Quarter Master Sergeant David Henderson, of the 4th regiment of native infantry, to be Sergeant Major, and Gunner Christopher Stokes, of the 2d company 3d battalion of artillery, to be Quarter Master Sergeant, to the depot battalion at Bareilly.

Quarter Master Sergeant Samuel McLeod, of the 73d regiment of native infantry, to be Sergeant Major, and Sergeant William Beattie, of the 4th company 3d battalion of artillery, to be Quarter Master Sergeant, to the depot battalion at Jaunpur.

Quarter Master Sergeant James Ewing, of the 20th regiment of native infantry, to be Sergeant Major, and Corporal Edwin Wainwright, of the 1st company 3d battalion of artillery, to be Quarter Master Sergeant, to the depot battalion at Delhi.

Corporal Wainwright is promoted to Sergeant, from this date.

The Commander of the Forces directs the following renewals and postings in the subordinate medical department:

Apothecary C. Lamborn, from Her Majesty's 21st foot, to the garrison hospital at Chinnahur.

Apothecary E. George (new promotion) to Her Majesty's 21st foot.

Apothecary H. Leach (new promotion) to Her Majesty's 21st foot.

Apothecary G. Simmonds (new promotion) to the 2d European regiment, and will proceed to the Presidency with the invalids of the season, and report himself to the officiating Superintending Surgeon there.

Apprentice C. A. Cox (new promotion) to Her Majesty's 20th foot, which he will join on the expiration of his present leave.

Steward J. Bain, from the 3d to the 2d brigade of horse artillery.

Steward M. Cunningham (new promotion) to the 3d brigade of horse artillery.

Steward C. Fernien (new promotion) to Her Majesty's 16th foot.

Assistant Apothecary T. McIlroy (new promotion) to Her Majesty's 3d batt.

Assistant Apothecary J. Mathews (new promotion) to the 3d troop 1st brigade of horse artillery.

Assistant Apothecary W. G. Bayley (new promotion) will place himself under the orders of the Superintending Surgeon of the Invalid Division.

Assistant Apothecary D. Wedgberg (new promotion) will do duty under the orders of the Superintending Surgeon of the Campore Division.

Assistant Apothecary J. Fenn (new promotion) and Assistant Apothecary F. Buchanan (new promotion) are directed to place themselves under the orders of the Superintending Surgeon of the Dinapore Division.

Assistant Steward W. Norris (new promotion) to Her Majesty's 16th foot.

James Cassidy Stott and William B. H. Green, who were appointed Hospital Apprentices in General Orders of the 18th June last, having failed to report themselves to the Superintending Surgeon within whose circle they reside, are struck off the list of subordinate medical servants.

The undermentioned individuals are appointed Hospital Apprentices, to fill the vacancies in the subordinate medical establishment, and are directed to report themselves, within two months from this date, to the nearest Superintending Surgeon:

These young men shall have served six months in any European hospital, special reports of their talents and acquirements are to be made to head quarters, by the Superintending Surgeon of the division in which they may be employed; and should it appear that any of them are not likely to become efficient subordinate medical attendants, such individuals as may be so considered, shall either be discharged the service, or disposed of as may hereafter be determined.

This is to be distinctly explained to the Apprentices, on their joining an hospital.

By order of the Commander of the Forces,

J. R. LITTLE, Major Secretary, Adjutant General of the Army.

GENERAL ORDER BY HIS EXCELLENCY'S COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

MR. SMITH'S REPORT ON THE POLICE.—A Correspondent of the Hurkaru, who has been so fortunate as to obtain a sight of the Report on the State of the Police, drawn up by the Superintendent, has published some observations on it in that journal, from which we infer, that Mr. Smith is unfriendly to two innovations which the general voice has, with some exceptions, pronounced to be reforms. The first refers to the substitution of the vernacular languages for the Persian in the Native Courts, fiscal, civil and magisterial. It is easy to account for, and to excuse, a lingering attachment, in some of the senior functionaries of Government, to the use of the old language, to which they have been accustomed through a long official career. But in estimating the nature and effects of the change, we must raise our minds above temporary considerations, and bring into view the anticipations of the future. For although the restoration of the vernacular languages to their legitimate place in our administration, is already found to be a blessing, by removing one main obstruction to the temple of justice, it is in the future and progressive improvement of the people, that the advantages attending it will be more particularly developed. The reform is one of such obvious necessity, that the future historian will surely credit the fact, that an enlightened Government, like that of England, could have continued for eighty years to force the people to transact all business in a language, foreign equally to them and to their rulers; and this anomaly will be ranked in the same class of absurdities with the exploded use of magic. Yet strange as it may seem, the change is still deprecated. With every respect for those who yet cling conscientiously, but we think, erroneously, to the use of Persian, we may be allowed to remark, that the first step in the improvement of our Courts, must necessarily be to throw them open to the people, by the adoption of their own language; the first movement towards national elevation, must be the removal of that proscription which prevented the cultivation of the languages, through which the great bulk of the people must receive and communicate ideas. Considering the national elevation of India as the great object for which our Government was placed here, it may be asserted with confidence, that if the change had occasioned more inconvenience than it has done, it was still a sacred duty to have adopted it. The inconvenience is partial and transient, and must vanish while we are contemplating it; the benefit will be general and permanent. Some fifteen or twenty score of Mahomedan Officers, who have too long enjoyed a monopoly of the public service, may be inconvenienced; and, perhaps, a dozen or so of our older Civilians; whereas, the blessings of the change are appropriated by a whole people, and will be increasingly felt as time rolls on. It has popularised our administration, beyond any other measure which we have adopted. Let not the partial inconvenience be named. Above all, let it not be hid at the door of the reform, when it ought to be attributed to the previous abuse.

The other point on which we must differ from Mr. Smith, relates to Act of 1832, one of Lord William Bentinck's, which forbade the Darogah to proceed to the investigation of thefts, unless the people desired his interference. In common with the whole Native community, we have considered this provision a most salutary one, in the existing circumstances of the country. It must be borne in mind, that when a Darogah comes down upon a village, it is not to secure robbers, but to plunder the innocent; that as sure as the sun rises and sets, so invariably does the Darogah fill his pockets upon every domiciliary visit; that from one end of the country to the other, there is nothing of which the Natives stand more in dread, than the arrival of this officer of justice in their village; and that he appears to them the visible personification of fraud, violence and extortion. Before Lord Bentinck's law, he had a right to visit every village, whenever his emissaries informed him that any stroke of business was to be done in his line. For one thief that he caught, a hundred innocent men were made to suffer. By the new law, his wings were clipped, and he was deprived of the 'right' to inflict his visitation upon any village, except as he was especially invited to do so. It was an infinite improvement on the old rule. This may be a libel on our system of administration; but it is, nevertheless, the truth. Possibly, twenty rogues now may escape in a district, but then a thousand innocent men escape also. Before we repeal this law, it becomes us to secure the people against the rapacity of the Darogah; so reduce his power, or so to augment the control over his actions, that his capacity for mischief shall be abridged. To revive the old state of things, would be, not to bring justice to every man's door, but to expose every man, however innocent, to be brought to justice, or rather its perversion. It is a question of pure humanity. As we never restore to the plundered inhabitants that of which the thieves may have deprived them, the just we can do is to leave them what the thieves have spared; and not to compel them to give that information to the Darogah which would inevitably be followed by the loss of it. It may be said that without this information, justice must be defrauded of its victims. To force men to complain, however, is not the most legitimate means of attaining the ends of justice; those will always be best secured when men voluntarily resort to our tribunals, in full confidence that the guilty only will be the sufferers. The people of this country have no natural fondness for being plundered, and no aversion to complain, except when they know that the remedy will be worse than the disease. If our Police were in a healthy state, and afforded more protection to the honest than to rogues, there would be no necessity for any coercive measures. The people would flock to the guardians of the public peace, and instead of thwarting, would be found continually to aid them.

CHINA.—Intelligence has been received from China to the 7th of September. Every fresh batch of intelligence from the Celestial Empire, since the detention of Captain Elliot, has been more disastrous than the preceding. We now learn that all intercourse has been suspended, and that without the formality of a warlike declaration, we actually are at war with the Chinese, and both parties are subject to all the inconvenience of a state of hostility. In consequence of Capt. Elliot's determination not to deliver up an Englishman to be sacrificed to the men of the Chinese, who was said to have been killed in an affray with some English and American sailors, the Commissioner Lin ordered all the Chinese servants of the English merchants at Macao to quit them, and eventually stopped all supplies, and forced them to take refuge in their ships. The Portuguese Government of Macao was officially thanked by Lin, for assisting the views of the Chinese; and the high functionary proceeded in person to the town, to express his satisfaction at the expulsion of the English by the Portuguese. The fleet, consisting of a very large number of merchantmen, was ill provided, and it became a matter of the first importance to obtain food. Captain Elliot, therefore, proceeded to ———, where the Natives freely supplied his wants; but the Mandarin Junk forbade the embarkation of the supplies. After due notice had been given them of his intentions, Capt. Elliot fired on them, and two Mandarins and four sailors were killed, but the Junk escaped under favour of the night. He had intended to attack the fort the next morning, and a thousand men were got in readiness; but during the night he changed his opinion; there was no attack, and the fleet remains without provisions. A Mr. Moss had embarked in a cutter from Macao, to join the fleet; but being detained by the tide, was obliged to anchor. In the dead of the night, while he and his crew were asleep, the Chinese war boats attacked his vessel, murdered the lascars, cut his child in two, and dreadfully mutilated him; but just as they were preparing to set the cutter on fire, an English ship hove in sight, and they decamped. The Ann was attacked by three war junks, filled with armed men, but after keeping up a running fire, succeeded in effecting her escape. Her shot is said by the Chinese to have killed no fewer than forty of their men. It was reported that the Commissioner was preparing a large fleet of war-boats and fire-ships to set the English fleet on fire, and every preparation was made to meet the emergency. The naval defence of the fleet had been committed to Capt. Smith, the Commander of H. M. S. the Voloze.

Affairs have now assumed a most serious aspect; and the prospect appears more remote than ever, that an amicable intercourse can be re-established, without such a demonstration of our power, as shall inspire the Chinese with respect, and secure justice in future transactions.

The conduct of the Chinese Government which might have been deemed laudable, while its efforts were directed only to the extirpation of the Opium trade, has now assumed an offensive character, which can be met only by coercion. The offer of 500 dollars for the head of every Englishman, and the poisoning of the springs of water, are crimes which cannot be allowed with impunity. Viewing the actual state of things, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion, than this; that no intercourse can be re-opened on the basis of submission. If this were even practicable, that intercourse would be interrupted by Chinese insolence in less than a month. We fully subscribe to the opinion of the Herkers, that we must give them a sound drubbing, and then do all in our power to restrain the trade in Opium.

It is amusing to learn, that the Court of Directors are chuckling over the present disorganization, as having arisen from the opening of the trade, whereas it has arisen mainly, if not entirely, from the rapacious officers sent from Leadenhall Street, to push the cultivation and exportation of Opium to the utmost.

X THE MAHOMEDAN'S STRICTURES ON THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT IN THE EAST.—We published last week a letter, purporting to be written by "A Mahomedan," on the comparative merits of the British and Mussulman Governments of India. The object of the writer was to shew, that the latter was a blessing, and that the former is a curse to the country. That our Correspondent is not a Native, will scarcely admit of a doubt. The style, the texture of the argument, and the cast of thought, are all English, in spite of the signature. If the writer be, indeed, a Mahomedan, he has, at best, the advantage of European parentage. The severity of his remarks on the British Government would almost lead to the supposition that he is a disappointed, possibly, an oppressed individual, and some allowance may, therefore, be made for his wounded feelings; but he surely transgresses those limits, within which he might reasonably have claimed sympathy, when he gives us the sweeping assertion, that "the great majority of Mahomedan rulers were blessings to India." There is something novel, if not chivalrous, in this attempt to enshrine the memory of Mahomedan misrule. The voice of history, however, so unanimously condemns that Government, that any serious attempt to refute our Correspondent, would appear to ninety-nine out of a hundred of our readers a redundant task, more especially as he supports them by no appeal to facts. As we might, however, in the opinion of one of our Contemporaries, be held responsible for the opinions of this writer, unless we offered a refutation of them, it may be as well for our own character briefly to examine the validity of his arguments.

He says, that the rule of the Mahomedans was favourable to the common people, the 'canaille.' Where is the proof of this? Does not the whole history of the Mahomedan power, so far as we are enabled, in the absence of direct testimony, to infer the condition of the people from the character of the public officers, demonstrate that the lower classes must have been far more oppressed than they are at present; that as the hope of relief was more remote and uncertain, extortion and injustice must have been more general and grinding. If we know any thing of the popular feelings, it is that the administration of Britain is emphatically the 'reign of the poor,' and we have frequently heard it urged against our rulers, that their attention is too much absorbed in the welfare of the lower orders. Under the Mahomedan rule, there may have been occasional instances of strict integrity and justice in the public functionaries, but the system of Government was evidently not fitted to promote these virtues. It was a system of squeezing through the whole range of the administration, from the village tyrant to the throne. The Village Officer squeezed the Ryot. The Fouladar and Zemindar squeezed the Village Officer. The Nizam squeezed the Zemindars and Fouladars (witness the celebrated Bykoont of Moorshed Kooler Khan, filled with ordure, through which Zemindars, who refused to bleed freely, were dragged,) and the Emperor squeezed the Dewan, when the sponge was supposed to be sufficiently saturated. We look in vain for honesty in the supreme or subordinate ranks of the service. Indeed, the maxim that whatever a public officer might have accumulated during his incumbency, belonged, at his death, to his superior, could not have failed to check any over anxiety to protect the people from extortions, of which the controlling officer expected, at no distant period, to obtain the largest share. The Fouladars of this, and other provinces, moreover, parcelled out the various districts among their own connections, who, under the shelter of their relationship with the vice-regal throne, amassed the most ambitious fortunes from the plunder of "a country. During the reign of the last Mahomedan Prince, the vigorous and virtuous Ali Verdy Khan, though for ten years the fairest province of Bengal were a prey to the remorseless Marattas, his own relatives were allowed to accumulate almost incredible wealth. One of these men,—doubtless a blessing to the country,—was enabled to leave seventy lakhs of Rupees at his death, though his office had been only that of a Fouladar. It is impossible that under such a system the condition of the poor peasantry could have been any thing but deplorable. The oppression of the Fouladar's relative fell, it is true, primarily upon the officers set over the people; but this so far from an alleviation, was only an aggra-vation of the general misery, for the extortions were thus brought with accumulated weight on the labouring classes.

The Government, both of the Mahomedans and the British, has been progressive, but in opposite directions; the one, an administration of progressive deterioration; the other, of gradual improvement. After the virtue and vigor of the founder of a Mahomedan dynasty had been laid in the dust, his purple-born successors gradually gave loose to their passions, with increasing violence, till the administration presented the usual appearance, and was involved in the common fate of a worn-out eastern despotism. Our Government, on its first establishment,—to our shame be it spoken,—exhibited most of the vices of the government which it supplanted—its rapacity, its recklessness, its injustice. But under the influence of those principles which we draw annually from the great source of purity at home; by the control of an enlightened and Christian public in England, it has gradually been sanctified; and no two conditions can be more opposite than that of the present administration, and that of Mr. Vansittart, in 1761-2-3. Our error consisted in taking the system of the Mahomedan Government for our model. That system, of which the great seminal principle is, that government exists for the benefit of the governors, was too long perpetuated by our rulers, and expired only after a severe struggle. At length, the noble and generous maxims of Christian policy, of which it is the main element, that government is a trust for the benefit of the people, gained the ascendancy. We abandoned our Mahomedan predilections, habits and feelings, and the career of Indian improvement commenced. But we cannot venture to pursue the comparison further. Our Correspondent may decide the question of oppression at once, by asking himself whether he would have ventured, under any Mahomedan Government, to have penned such strictures on the ruling power, as those he sent us, or whether any Editor or Printer would have had the hardihood to print them.

On those strictures a very brief comment will suffice. A Mahomedan allows, that under our rule, there are seldom any acts of open violence, and by implication admits, that the Native aristocracy are in easy circumstances. But, then, we are more rapacious; and we send thousands to a premature grave by starvation. But is it not a fact that we do not collect more from the country than the Nonbudars did, though the number of tax-payers has increased fifty per cent? How can it be said that we starve them? Moreover, we collect taxes from the aristocracy, the Zemindars, and not from the people. If, then, the people have been sent by thousands to the grave, it must have been through the extortion of the Zemindars; and as they are represented as so well off, this idea is, perhaps, not far from the truth. If the peasant paid nothing but the tax which the Government receives, and a fair per centage on it to the Zemindar, there would not be a tear or a groan in the land. As to the Police of the country, it is bad, worse, worst. We will subscribe to any picture a Mahomedan may draw of the wretched Natives. But it is our Native Officers, the Hindoo equally with the Mahomedan, who are the great plague of the country. It is the impunity they enjoy from the absence of European control, that has reduced the people to this singular state of feeling, that they dread a Native Darogah more than a Native robber? Our Civil Courts are, perhaps, better; but even here there is room for much improvement. By the continued preference we have given to a foreign language, we have given a monopoly of office to the Mahomedans. They are, for the most part, our Scribes, Peshkars, Nazims, Mubarrers; and the delay of justice is their aim. While the people weep at the oppressions of our Civil Courts, the ministerial officers grow fat on them.

Our Correspondent has thought fit to bring forward a catalogue of the crimes of our Civilians. Why does he not send up the statement, with their names, to Government? In no one case will they be suffered to pass into oblivion. We can affirm this from experience. We published some such strictures some time since. We were instantly required to give up such particulars, as should enable Government to investigate their truth. First came down on us the Register of the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut; then the Secretary to the Government of Bengal; then the Superintendent of Police; and to crown the whole, Lord Auckland, living at the other end of India, sent to demand explanations. In every case was the charge fully investigated. Can a Mahomedan say as much of the Government he has undertaken to extol?

Having now published the letter of "A Mahomedan" with our own remarks, we must decline the honour of his further correspondence. We cannot lend our columns to anonymous aspersions on a body of men, who, with some exceptions, have deserved well of the country. He is, of course, at liberty to transfer his correspondence to the British India Society, but it will meet even there with but a cool reception, unless he furnishes his name as a guarantee for his assertions, and gives the gentlemen of the service an opportunity of meeting his charges, by the publication of their names also.

OATHS.—We publish the letter of our Correspondent J., without exactly comprehending it. He requires, "What is the difference between a Hindoo's coming into Court and calling upon his God, and the old form?" We should say, None, surely; for by the old form he called upon his God, his idol. It is not easy, moreover, to conceive how a Native's declaring, in the presence of Almighty God, (the Param Brahm, the eternal, the self-existent deity), that he will declare the truth, is called a farce. If it be, then the Court itself is a farce, for justice is a farce in this land, and the sooner our tribunals are closed, the better. That one who has too tender a conscience to administer idolatrous oaths, is a fire and fagot-man, as our Correspondent supposes, is a very startling assertion, to which few of our readers are, we believe, prepared to subscribe. It has hitherto been understood that fire and fagot-men, so far from possessing tender consciences, had no consciences at all. And why, we would ask, should every man of tender conscience be driven from the service? A sprinkling, at least, of such men,—there is little fear of their growing too numerous,—can do the public service no harm; and may, possibly, do some good, even by their strict-laced morality, by keeping alive elevated notions of moral obligation, which all public men are, more or less, apt to forget. They err, if they err at all, on the right side; and, considering the vast numbers who err on the opposite side, it is as well that they should be allowed to remain, were it only to make some approach to an equilibrium. There was a time when the Civilians were said to leave their consciences at the Cape, as they came out; and we have never heard that the country was better governed in those days, than in these modern times, when some of the gentlemen of the Civil Service are reputed to have consciences of too tender a complexion. No wise Government would banish such men. It is not politic in any Christian Government to make the path into its service so strait, that conscientious men cannot enter, any more than it is prudent to make the entrance into the Courts so narrow, that conscientious witnesses cannot pass through. In the one case it may be that honesty; and, in the other, that truth is ex-clouded. Our Correspondent prophesies, that not one more respectable witness will come into the Court under the new Act, than came in under the old. We hope he will prove a false prophet; and, doubtless, he entertains the same wish himself. At any rate, the experiment was worth trying. It is an old English justice,—none the better, however, for its age,—that truth can be obtained only by swearing, and security of property only by hanging. And we have continued to act on this venerable prejudice, till it was found that more thefts were committed under the gallows, than in any other haunt of vice, and that less truth was to be found in our Courts than in any other place. England may be said almost to have abolished hanging. King Henry the Eighth hanged, taking one year with another, twelve hundred rogues during every year of his reign. Last year six only were hanged in England; and property is, perhaps, more secure than at any former period. The Government of India is now determined to try how far truth may be obtained, without oaths: and we doubt not the result will be equally successful. There is, however, this one consolation, even if the new law should fail, that it can lead to no increase of falsehood in our Courts.

THE NEW SALE LAW.—A Correspondent of the Harkara, "A Landholder," has pointed out an error into which we inadvertently fell, in our remarks on the proposed Law for the Sale of Land, which had fallen into arrears. We cheerfully acknowledge our mistake. The New Law does not provide that the Collector shall be at liberty to receive the revenue on estates in arrears up to the day of sale, but limits the reception to the day which may be fixed by the Board, after which no offer of payment can stay the sale. Upon this provision there has been a variety of conjectures, and even misgivings; and it has been surmised, that so novel an attempt to force punctuality on the Native Zemindars, may bring half the estates in the country to the hammer. The Landholders have been so much accustomed to withhold payment to the eleventh hour; the practice is so strictly in accordance with the national propensities, that any alteration, will, it has been supposed, fail of its effect. Doubtless, the greatest luxury which could be granted to a Zemindar, would be to allow him to pay in the revenue just as the hammer was about to fall; but the fears which have been entertained of the danger of the new enactment, are, we think, misplaced. Its first operation may be distressing; but as the Natives will lose nothing by it, except the darling privilege of procrastination, a little firmness will make the practice easy and beneficial.

From the letter of "A Landholder," we are led to infer, that Government has sent the Draft of the New Act to the Landholder's Society of Calcutta. We are happy to find that the Legislative Council is likely thus to secure the opinion of some Zemindars of acknowledged experience and ability; but why should the previous knowledge of an Act, which so deeply affects the welfare of the whole community, be limited to so small a number of Landholders? Is it not an imperative duty to disseminate copies of the Act throughout the land, in the vernacular tongue, previous to its being passed? May we venture, then, to advise, that the Act be instantly translated into Bengalee; that a copy be sent through the Collectors to all Zemindars of note; that they be invited to send in their opinions in writing, to the Collector, super-scribed, "Opinions on the New Sale Law;" and that the Collector be required to transmit them, without delay, to the Board; and that the day for the final consideration of the law be postponed for a month or two beyond the time fixed.

As we are anxious to obtain as many independent opinions as possible upon this important question, we publish the letter of our Correspondent, Adscriptus Glibor, with much pleasure. He brings forward a new grievance. The facts he has stated go far to show the ingenuity of unyugue which the Natives have attained. According to his account, the Ryots have availed themselves of a very equitable law, to defeat the claims of their Landlords for rent. So entirely relaxed is the state of morals in these lower provinces, that it is next to impossible to establish an equitable balance of power between Landlord and Tenant. The smallest leaning of the scale in favour of the Ryot, ruins the Zemindar; the slightest preponderance in favour of the Landholder, estranges the Tenant. Yet it is difficult to conceive, first, where the Ryot obtained the courage to drag his Zemindar into the Courts; and, secondly, how the Zemindar, with the terrific power conferred on him by "Kanoon Hifstum," Reg. VII. of 1793, can fail to crush a refractory Tenant. On these points Adscriptus Glibor must enlighten our minds.

REPORT ON BOOTAN, BY CAPTAIN R. B. PEMBERTON, ENVOY TO BOOTAN IN 1838.—Second Notice.—As we have before observed, it is the Second Part of Captain Pemberton's Report, which is devoted to Bootan. It is divided into six Sections: of which the first contains the narrative of Captain Pemberton's Mission; the second, a general description of Bootan in its appearance, rivers, roads and geology; the third, the political condition of the country, under the heads of government, priesthood, revenues and military resources; the fourth describes the productive industry of Bootan, in agriculture, live stock, wild animals and birds, manufactures and commerce; the fifth, the civil and social state of Bootan under the heads of population, language, religious observances, dress, buildings, fash, amusements and moral character; the sixth and last Section treats of the political relations of Bootan, with China and Tibet; with Nepal, and with Sikkim: and the Report is concluded with the Envoy's observations and suggestions, respecting the relations between Bootan and his own Government.

Bootan lies between 26° 30' and 28° of north latitude and between 88° 45' and 92° 25' of east longitude. It is, therefore, about 220 geographical miles in length, and 90 in breadth, and has an area of 19,800 square geographical miles, of which about 6,000 are allowed for the lowland tracts of the doocra. Giving to the lowland tracts the average population of Assam, which is 10 to the square mile, they will contain 60,000 souls. To the hill country of Bootan, Captain Pemberton thinks it a liberal allowance to suppose the population amounts to 6 to the square mile, or 79,200 in all. He reckons, therefore, that 145,200 must be rather a high estimate of the population of the whole country. The people are divided into classes, which, however, have but little in common with the castes of the Hindoos. They are eight in number. The first two are denominated the Wang and Kampe, and are considered to be the descendants of the Tibetan conquerors of the country. The highest offices are theoretically reserved for the Wangs: the inferior are enjoyed by the Kampe, but not to the exclusion of the next two classes, called the Blatya and Koohee. The next three orders, the Raungtam, Raughal and Tebula, are of very inferior rank; and from the hand of the Tjula it is said none of the others will eat. The eighth is a religious tribe, generally permitted to marry; but those members of it who pretend to peculiar sanctity, or undertake sacerdotal functions, repudiate marriage altogether.

The Deb and the Dharma Raja are the secular and spiritual Princes of Bootan. The former obtains his office by the election of a Supreme Council, and holds it for three years, or as much longer as by force and intrigue he can keep possession. The Dharma Raja is esteemed a perpetual incarnation of deity, a sort of younger brother to the grand Lama of Tibet, whose appearance is recognized a year after the decease of the previous arata, according to certain indications of precocious holiness which the priesthood are able to recognize. He likewise has his Council, which is composed of twelve Gyungs or Monks, who reside habitually in his Palace. The province of the Dharma Raja and his Council is to regulate the affairs of religion and literature, or the worship and education of the people. But as they furnish several members to the Secular Council of the Deb Raja, they have ample scope for the same spirit of intrigue which other ecclesiastics generally exhibit. But, in fact, the chief power lies with neither the Deb nor the Dharma Raja or their Councils. There are two great Chieftains who nearly divide the country between themselves, and are too powerful to submit to any control that crosses their own inclination, and yield such a measure only of regard to the ostensible rulers of the land as is prudent for their own interests. These are the Puro and the Tongso Pilo: themselves entitled to a seat in the Supreme Council, whenever they visit the Capital. The Puro Pilo is Governor of Western Bhotan; and his jurisdiction extends from the Teesta on the west, to the right bank of the Techincho, which, under the name of the Godhadur, falls into the Brunnapootra, about 12 miles below Rangpooty, in Bengal. Under him are six Zompons, in Mohammedan usage called sodabs, with inferior officers called Chang Zompons, and Doompas; and as the patronage of these appointments belongs to the Pilo, and not to the Supreme Government, all the power derived from the country under his authority is likewise in his hands. The Tongso Pilo rules over the eastern part of Bhotan, and, therefore, has under his authority the dooras on our Assam frontier. He is a very powerful chief, and has too deep an interest in the profits of those forays, of which the British Government have had so much to complain, to be favourable to any arrangement which would effectually put an end to them. But for him there appears to have been every likelihood of the Deb Raja concluding a formal treaty with our Government. Without his consent, however, it could not be done.

The priesthood profess celibacy; and all candidates for the highest offices of state must do so too. As elsewhere, this is so far from raising the standard of moral purity, that it is, on the contrary, a fruitful source of the most revolting demoralization. It is also assisted in its degrading influence by the practice of polyandry; which prevails extensively in the central and northern parts of Bhotan, but seems to be put to shame towards the south, by association with the people of our plains.

* The revenues of Bhotan are extremely limited. Contributions to the extent of about 40,000 Rupees are drawn annually from the dooras. Presents are made both to the Deb and the Dharma Rajas by all who are nominated to office. "The revenue contributed by the population of the hills, is almost entirely confined to the payment of a certain proportion of the produce of the lands in grain, whether of wheat, barley, or rice; of a quota of goats, sheep, ghee, fowls and cloths, all of which are paid by the cultivators to their respective chiefs, and forwarded by them to the Pils, in whose castles they are stored." What is wanted is there consumed, and the surplus is forwarded to the capital for the use of the Deb and the Dharma Raja. Captain Pemberton considers that the total revenue drawn from every source, can hardly amount to two lakhs of Rupees per annum; and of this, but a very small proportion can be available for any public exigency.

thing that could be called an army. "There is nothing like a standing military force in the country, beyond the guards necessary for the protection of the castles of the different Sobhals: at Tatsissulon and Poonakha, on ordinary occasions, they amount to about 100 men, and in the castles of the Pils, to nearly an equal number. On state occasions they are largely reinforced, and when the Mission received its audience at Poonakha, the number of armed followers present must have amounted to between three and four hundred persons. During the time that they are on duty at the palaces, the men are fed and armed from the public stores, and when detached, they bear an order under the red seal of the Deb, for the necessary supplies, from the different villages through which they pass." The miserable arms and cowardly spirit of these soldiers, render them utterly contemptible in the field.

The country is poor to the last degree, in every sense. The nature of its surface precludes the idea of fertility. "The more lofty summits of the mountains may be estimated at from 12 to 15,000 feet above the level of the sea; from this height down to an elevation of above 10,000 feet, the ridges of the mountains present an almost mural precipice, marked by the bare and rugged outlines of the gneiss, which in all the ridges I had an opportunity of examining, constitutes the central nucleus of the most lofty peaks. At 10,000 feet, fir and pines appear rather abundantly, and from thence down to eight and nine thousand feet, is a zone of vegetation, consisting principally of oaks, rhododendrons, and firs." "At about eight thousand feet, the rugged edges of the superincumbent formations, which rest so forcibly on the central nucleus, generally terminate, and form a basis for the reception of the minute particles which are precipitated from the superior ridges and peaks above them, by the disintegrating effects of weather and climate. A soil is thus formed, better adapted to the purposes of husbandry than, but for this provision of nature, would be otherwise attainable." But these favourable situations are few and contracted; and the produce of them is still further limited by the want of industry and energy in the people, aggravated by the insecurity of their enjoyment of the fruits of their labour. Whilst they live, the screw is applied to them without mercy; and when they die, their property passes wholly from their family to the state. It is true, in their circumstances, they are not likely to have much to leave behind them.

The manufactures of the Bhotenas are very rude, and few in number. They have both iron and copper from the mountains in the eastern part of the country; and of the former they manufacture weapons and rough cutlery; and of the latter, caldrons. Coarse blankets, and cotton cloth, the celebrated paper of the Daphne papyfera, very imperfectly tanned leather, and vessels of fine wood and coarse pottery make up the remainder of their manufactures. Indeed, so small is the productive industry of Bhotan, that Captain Pemberton thinks the whole foreign trade to Tibet on the one side, and Bengal and Assam on the other, does not exceed fifty thousand Rupees per annum. There is also a direct trade between Tibet and Bengal and Assam. Two of the routes by which this annual trade is carried pass through Bhotan; the one ending in Rangpore, in Bengal; and the other, at Hazara in Assam. A third route, also terminating in the last mentioned place, does not enter the Bhotan territory at all, but lies east of it, entirely across a tract of country dependent upon Lassa, and forming an integral part of the Tibet territory. Indeed we have the Tibetans, and, therefore, the Chinese and the British frontiers in immediate contact with each other at the Koorengpa Doon, in the valley of Assam, and not more than fifteen miles from the northern bank of the Brahmapootra.

Bootan, it must be evident, is itself of very little importance. Yet its position on our frontier, and the facilities it might afford to other states to annoy our provinces, give it a strong claim to consideration. We trust, therefore, we shall be excused, if next week we add a third notice, which shall be devoted to its foreign relations.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7.

— Mr. Turtton's promised plan for the Precursor Steamer, is in part published in the papers of this morning. We are happy to learn that it enjoys the support of some of the most influential characters in Calcutta: of many, indeed, of the warmest friends of the Comprehensive Plan, which may serve to shew that, in their opinion, the two schemes will not clash.

— No news of the Mail. The Bombay papers of the 26th are in, but the Steamer had not arrived.

— The Gyranushkan states, that a Native gentleman intends to construct a road between Barrackpore and Gournay, which we are happy to hear; but we are not happy to find our Contemporary so oblivious of the truth, as to assert, that "Government is now enriching its coffers by screwing money even from the meanest beggar, whose livelihood depends upon the bare produce of a few cottas of rent-free land." Government does not resume land under a hundred beegahs, or two thousand cottas; all resumptions under that from the "meanest beggars are made by the Zemindar."

— The equestrian statue of Sir Thomas Munro, by Chantry, has just been placed upon its pedestal, and exhibited to the good folks of Madras. It is said to be the most splendid production of that unrivalled artist in India. The occasion was celebrated by the firing of guns; and as the Madras Government is in the habit of firing salutes on the birth-days of the deified heroes of the Heathen, the Pagans in that town have been led, by parity of reason, to believe that it was a God of the Christians, which they had set up, and rejoiced over. Lord Elphinstone hospitably entertained the community at Madras.

— The Bombay papers state, that no sooner did that liberal Parsee, Jamsjee Jejeebhoy, hear that the Court of Directors had agreed to his proposal, regarding the establishment of a Hospital, in connection with the Dispensary, than he immediately paid up his magnificent donation of one lakh of Rupees.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8.

— A meeting of the Asiatic Society was held on Wednesday evening last, but as the best part of the members were absent holiday-making, there was 'no house,' and the meeting resolved itself into a conversation, at which Dr. O'Shaughnessy exhibited and explained his Electro-magnetic Telegraph.

— It is confidently stated, that in consequence of the entire ascendancy which the Prime Minister, Dileean Singh, has obtained at the Court of Lahore, where the son, Now Nehal, is his tool, and the father, Klurruick Singh, his puppet, a disposition unfavourable to British interests has manifested itself. The permission given to the troops across the Indus, to return through the Punjab, has been rescinded; and the draft cattle that were proceeding to join them, have been refused a passage across the Sutledge. This may eventually, at no distant period, lead to a rupture, which shall bring Sikh and British valour into contact, and end in establishing British influence through the Punjab.

— The Commercial Advertiser, of this morning, has some remarks on the Draft of the New Act, which is to authorize tradesmen to charge interest. It can be nothing but a law for the Booksellers, who have reduced their profits to twenty-five per cent., to charge interest on defaulters, but when one hundred per cent. is the smallest profit put on Europe-made articles by the tradesmen of Calcutta, an addition of twelve per cent. interest will be severely felt. The best mode of stimulating prompt payments, is to make them advantageous; which they cannot be, while the difference between prompt payment and credit is, that in the one case a profit of eighty-eight; in the other, a profit of a hundred per cent. is charged.

— A tax on wheel carriages in Calcutta is talked of, to water the roads; but it will, probably, kick up more dust than it will allay.

— A number of the most wealthy and respectable Natives of Bombay have presented an address to Sir Charles Forbes, which, for generosity of sentiment, and elegance of style, has seldom been rivaled. It is alike honourable to the Bombay community and to Sir Charles. In order "to perpetuate, in the most lasting manner, the sentiments they entertain," they have raised a subscription of 38,000 Rupees, (about 3,000 £) among themselves, in order to procure a marble statue of him from the chisel of Chantry. That unflinching sculptor has engaged to prepare a statue for 3,000 £.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9.

— Letters from Kurnool give hopes of prize-money to the gallant troops employed in the expedition. A great number of boxes and bags, filled with specie, have been discovered; and the Nabob's women, who still continue in the Palace, to the number of three hundred and eighty, state that treasure to a large amount is yet concealed in their apartments. It has now been discovered, that the Zemindar contained three hundred thousand pounds of gunpowder. If the place had been besieged, it would scarcely have been possible to avoid an explosion, and the loss of life which must have ensued, would have been such as the mind cannot contemplate without shuddering.

— Government has just advertised 18,932 chests of Opium for Sale by Auction, at any price above the upset price of 400 Rupees the chest.

— A report has been current at Bombay, that Sir Henry Fane intends to put Sir Jasper Nicholls under arrest, for having unduly assumed the authority of Commander-in-Chief, while His Excellency is in the country. Sir Jasper has done no such thing; but is quietly awaiting the receipt of his Commission from home, and the departure of his predecessor.

— A letter from Cabul of the 6th October says, that a note, written in English, had just been put into the hands of Sir Alexander Burnes, by a Hindoo arrived from Bokhara. The letter was from the unfortunate Col. Stoddart, and was addressed to the British Agent at Cabul. It stated that the Colonel was a prisoner in the jail at Bokhara, and that he was frequently exhibited in the Bazar of the place; and prayed earnestly to be released, dead or alive.

— The treasure and the rum which had been sent on to the ARMY OF CABUL, has safely reached that place. Thirteen lakhs of Rupees, and many thousand gallons of spirits, must, it is said, have proved very acceptable to the ARMY OF THE INDUS, who have been without cash or rum for many months past.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11.

— Intelligence was yesterday received from China. It is more disastrous than ever. War appears to have actually commenced, and it must be prosecuted with vigour, before we can expect an honourable peace. For particulars we must refer to our editorial notice.

— To accommodate the members of the Civil Service Government has determined that the annual applicants for furlough on the 1st of November, shall have the benefit of the furloughs which may lapse, by return or expiry, to the 31st of March next succeeding. If this arrangement had not been adopted, there would have been only two furloughs vacant for thirty-one applicants. By extending the period, fourteen additional furloughs will be available.

— The demand for freight on the Steamer Apple, to proceed up the river, having exceeded the supply, the freight was put up to male, and realized, the highest, 4 Rs. a cubic foot; the lowest, 2 Rs. 4 annas.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 12.

— The Bombay Mail is now three complete days, and two nights behind, and we naturally infer that the September Mail must now be on its way.

— A letter from our new Sanatorium, Dargeling, dated the 5th of the month, represents the climate as delightful; fine frosty weather, with clear sunny days. The Natives of the plains were flocking to it; supplies were abundant, and the roads rapidly progressing.

— The present state of the Police about Calcutta may be gathered from the fact, that on Thursday night last, a large gang of Dacoits proceeded to the house of a wealthy Native, at Baranpore, about three miles from the boundary of Calcutta, fully armed, and plundered it of every thing, in the presence of the villagers and the Police, who saw them deliberately walk off with property to the value of a thousand Rupees and more. We learn that the Dargah is not diligently employed in making search for the gang, in which, as usual, he will be unsuccessful; but all the neighbouring villages will be obliged to pay him well for letting them off.

— On Saturday last, Dr. O'Shaughnessy delivered his Introductory Lecture on Natural Philosophy, to the students of the Medical College, in the presence of His Excellency, Sir Jasper Nicholls, Drs. Wise and Stewart, the Professors of the College, and some other distinguished patrons of Native improvement.

— The Union Bank has just revived an old rule, which forbids the ending of any checks below Ten Rupees; this has given rise to some discussion in the papers. It has been too much the custom for some constituents of the Bank to shew the convenience it affords, by making this Institution keep the accounts of their petty domestic disbursements.

LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

The Oxford Mail with news to the 16th September, arrived in Calcutta, on Tuesday, at 9 A. M., having been brought to Bombay on the 29th ult. by the Heracle from Suez, the 11th of October. The most satisfactory intelligence it brings is that tranquillity has been restored, in a great degree, in England, without any extraordinary exercise of power; and that the ruinous civil war in Spain is nearly closed.

Parliament was prorogued by Her Majesty in person, on the 27th of August. The Royal Speech expresses satisfaction in the settlement of differences between Holland and Belgium, through the mediation of the Five Powers, and anticipates a similar settlement of affairs between Turkey and Egypt, from the unanimous determination of these same Powers "to uphold the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire." After referring to Her Majesty's endeavours to effect a reconciliation between France and Mexico, and a convention lately concluded with France to put an end to differences between the British and French fishermen, Her Majesty expresses her determination to continue negotiations "to persuade all the powers of Christendom to unite in a general league for the entire extinction of the Slave Trade." The differences with Persia have not yet been adjusted. The ARMY OF THE INDIAS has not been opposed, and the hope is expressed that the important objects of the campaign will be finally obtained. The domestic matters noticed in the Speech, are the improvements effected in the Police of London and the country towns, the Penny Postage Reform, the advantageous terms on which a considerable amount of funded debt has been converted into stock, and the suppression of the insubordination which had spread extensively through the country.

Mr. Spring Rice has been raised to the peerage as Baron Montague; Mr. Poulett Thomson has been appointed Governor General of Canada; and Lord Howick and Mr. C. Wood have resigned. The following new arrangements, therefore, have been made in the Ministry: Lord John Russell has left the Home Department for the Colonies; the Marquis of Northampton has taken the Home Department; Lord Montague is Comptroller of the Exchequer, Mr. F. Baring, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. H. Labouchere, President of the Board of Trade, Mr. R. L. Shell Vice President of the Board of Trade, Mr. T. Wyse, Lord of the Treasury, Mr. R. Gordon Secretary to the Treasury, and Mr. Moore O'Farrell, Secretary to the Admiralty, and Mr. V. Smith, Under Secretary to the Colonies.

The elections consequent on these changes have not all been in favour of the liberal party. Mr. Sutton, son of Lord Canterbury has defeated Mr. Gibson at Cambridge. At Manchester, Mr. Gregg, a liberal and a disserter, has won the day against Sir G. Murray.

The Rev. J. R. Stephens, charged with using seditious language, was tried at the Chester Assizes, and sentenced to 18 months imprisonment in the Kaitford House of Correction, and to give security for the peace, himself in £500, and two sureties in £250 each. This man was a preacher of the Methodists, and seceded with many others from that body. He afterwards sunk deeply in general character, as well as political pravity. Others of the Chartists were found guilty of conspiracy to disturb the public peace at the same assizes. The Birmingham rioters had been found guilty on a more heinous charge, and condemned to die; but they were respited.

In the end of August, the Thames Tunnel had reached low water mark.

Lord Eglington's foolery of a Tournament met with the fate it deserved. Drizzling rain made it even more than ridiculous.

The meeting of the British Association for the advancement of Science, was held at Birmingham in the end of August, but is said to have attracted little notice. The next meeting is to be held in Glasgow, with the Marquis of Bradfield as President, and Principal McFarlane, Sir D. Brewster, and Sir T. Brisbane, Vice Presidents.

The King and Queen of the Belgians arrived in England on the 6th September.

The Marquis of Hastings has published an ill-advised statement of the melancholy case of his late sister. Her reputation had been amply vindicated, and universal sympathy extended to the family. No good, therefore, was to be gained by further publication.

Two perragos, which have been some time in abeyance, have been revived by Her Majesty. That of Bray's has been given to Mrs. Otway Cave, mother of Mr. Robert Otway Cave, M. P.; and that of Canoy's to Mr. Storer, representative of the elder brother.

The Eriths, Capt. Russ, and the Terror, Capt. Crosier, have sailed on an Antarctic expedition. They are to leave officers to take charge of the Observatories at St. Helena and the Cape, proceed to furnish an Observatory at Van Dieman's Land, and then steer direct for the south pole—or at least the nearest point to it they can reach, and afterwards go all round to enter by any door that is open. It seems new land has been seen in February of the present year by one of Mr. Enderby's ships.

The operation of the Slave Trade Suppression Bill has been continued by the Lords to Portuguese and Spanish Vessels. It was opposed altogether by the Duke of Wellington and some other Tory Lords; but was carried by 39 to 24.

It seems the Lord Advocate has been instructed by Her Majesty's Ministers to confer with the Procurator for the Church of Scotland, as to the best means of coming to an arrangement of the differences between the General Assembly and the Courts of Law, in the matter of patronage.

The Rev. Dr. Lee has been appointed head of the Committee for superintending the printing of the Bible in Scotland.

English Commerce having been wronged by the French blockade of Portugal, in Africa, some uneasiness has been occasioned between the two countries; but the affair appears to be in a train for amicable settlement.

The war in Spain seems at length to be near a termination. The greater part of the army of Don Carlos, under Maroto, has gone over to the Queen; and at the last dates Don Carlos appears to have been almost entirely deserted.

The Portuguese are reportedly furious against England, because of the Slave Trade Suppression Bill.

Sir Jasper Nicholls, K. C. B. was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Company's Forces by the Court of Directors on the 14th, and an Extraordinary Member of the Council of India on the 21st of August. Sir Samuel F. Whittington has been appointed Commander-in-Chief at Madras, and Sir Archibald Campbell, Commander-in-Chief at Bombay; but the Naval and Military Gazette states that the last appointment will not take effect.

Sir J. Keane has been made a Knight Grand Cross of the Bath.

A vacancy having occurred in the Direction of the East India Company, by the demise of Josias Du Pre Alexander, Esq., Mr. James Weyr Hogg has been elected to his vacant place.

The Company's Steamer, Scoutis, was launched on the 10th September. The Neptunia and Queen are expected to sail early in November.

The Vernon, with a 30 horse steam engine has sailed. She was detained two days at Portsmouth by an accident.

befalling her machinery, but finally got off on the 14th September. The combination of steam and sails worked admirably in her passage down the river. She is splendidly fitted up, and means have been taken to ventilate the between-deck cabins, so as to render them much more comfortable than they usually are.

The Vernon brings out a shipment of superior sheet lead for the Assam Tea Company, and two Belgium farmers, who have been engaged by the British India Experimental Flax Society, to superintend the culture and preparation of flax here.

It is now generally known, it is said, that the sole difficulty in the way of the Comprehensive Steam Communication between India and England exists on the part of the Court of Directors. Memorials, therefore, are immediately to be forwarded to that body from all the mercantile places in the United Kingdom, preparatory to a strong remonstrance to Parliament on the subject.

The affairs of Turkey and Egypt remain much as they were. Mr. Waghorn has been on a visit to Constantinople with confidential communications from the Pacha to the Porte and the English Ambassador; but neither their nature nor result is known.

EDUCATION AT MADRAS.

The reports of three useful and philanthropic Institutions are lying on our table—the Orphan Asylum in Black Town, and the Schools of Vepery and John Pereira's—all the work of clarity in promotion of the mental and bodily comfort of the poor population of these crowded districts.

The Male and Female Orphan Asylum with the Free Day School for Boys attached to them is progressing satisfactorily. 120 orphans of both sexes continue to be the number receiving the advantages of the charity; and, by the Government having recently accorded to them a grant of 10,000 Rupees from the Funds left over in charge by the late Mr. Woolley, on condition of their supporting six children, male or female, of Europeans in destitute circumstances, they are enabled to add this to the sum of benefits they confer. The Free Day School since its establishment in 1807, has admitted 789 boys, and 82 now remain profiting by the education it affords: the quality of this is commensurate in the following extract:—

“3.—No distinction is observed in the plan of Education pursued with respect to the Orphans and the Free Day Scholars. The higher classes to the Male Asylum and Free Day School for Boys are taught English Grammar and Composition, Geography, History, and Arithmetic. In addition to which the first class learn Geometry and Algebra—and the minor classes easy Reading, Spelling, Arithmetic, and Catechism. One hundred boys are taught the Tamil and Telugoo Languages, and they continue to progress creditably. The same branches of Education are taught, (except the Native languages, Geometry and Algebra,) with plain needle-work, in the Female Asylum, where tambour-work and knitting have been recently introduced. Religious instruction is carefully attended to in these Institutions, and one of the means pursued with that view, is the daily reading of the Scriptures.”

The last examination of the children, by the Rev. Mr. Mahon, was very satisfactory.

The Vepery Male and Female Free Schools are an invaluable resource to the indigent families in that populous district, affording to their children the means of a plain but useful education, and freeing them from that bane in youthful life, rendered otherwise unavoidable by their destitution and the enforced absence of their parental influence without restraint. 481 have profited by these schools since their establishment:—at present 69, 43 boys and 26 girls, remain under tuition. There are distinct buildings for the schools of the two sexes, and, independent of the plain education afforded to the girls, a part of every day is devoted to their instruction in needle work. “This institution has, we are supplied to Government for a particular purpose in the benefit of Mr. Woolley’s bequest, but without success, as its course did not appear exactly to embrace the objects contemplated by the testator.

The Union Free School at John Pereira’s was only established in 1830, for the benevolent purpose of giving a plain education to the children of families in reduced circumstances and in destitution, who, owing to the distance of other similar institutions, were precluded from sending their children there. 123 have since then entered the school, of whom 47 are now under instruction, and the examination reports furnished, of their progress in useful and religious knowledge, are creditable to them.

Brief as is the foregoing notice, we believe it suffices to warm into the aid of active support, the many sincere friends of education with whom this Presidency abounds. These institutions have no common claim; they speak to the parent principle of benevolence: the objects of their relief are the orphan, the poor and the destitute—to give a home to those whom the severance of the nearest earthly ties has driven forth homeless wanderers in the world, and to diffuse the blessings of a sound and religious education over those, to whom no path would otherwise appear but that which leads to vice and misery. The sympathy of the head and the heart is alike called for towards them; and, almost entirely dependent as they are on the charity of the public, we hope to hear that no appeals they may make will prove vain to draw the purse string, and ensure a lavish outpouring of the essentials of support.—Madras Spectator.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NATIVE EDUCATION.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

GENTLEMEN,—The columns of your Journal ever being open to communications having for their object the welfare of India, and among these, many articles on Education having occupied a prominent place, will, I trust, be a sufficient apology, if one be necessary, for the hasty notes and imperfect hints now submitted to your notice. Education; I speak of that offered in the Government Schools, appears not so popular in the North West Provinces as in Bengal; and a few observations on this may not be altogether useless. In Bengal the people having been long under English rule; having been much employed in various ways under Government, and having enjoyed opportunities of intercourse with Europeans, at least at the Presidency, the solid advantages derivable from a knowledge of the English language, have been strong and constant inducements to its acquisition: the result is, that there is scarcely any office whatever, public or private, in which English is required, from the frontiers of Bengal to the extremities of the Presidency of Fort William, but what is filled by Bengalee Writers. The offices open to Natives in the Upper Provinces are chiefly attached to the Courts of Judicature, to hold which a knowledge of Persian (confined in most cases to an acquaintance with mere forms,) was required, and an acquaintance with Oordoo, in the Persian character, is now indispensable. The few copyists required, as before noticed, being chiefly, if not entirely, Bengalees. Situations of a superior description, such as Deputy Collectorships, Moonshidships, &c., are generally given to Moonshams, old attachés of the Courts, well versed in all descriptions of chicanery and corruption, so plentiful in Mofussil Courts, sufficiently tinged with the pride of orthodoxy, ignorance and bigotry, to be proof against any kind of innovation having a tendency to enlightenment of mind. Considerable prejudices exist among the Natives to an English education; the erroneous idea, that the conversion of their children to Christianity, is the object of Government Schools, still deters numbers of Western Hindoos and Moonshams from resorting to them. Pride of birth, producing dislike to a mixture with other castes, also extensively operates. It would appear that these obstacles are not so powerful among the Bengalees; yet I believe, a very considerable proportion of the boys in most of the Schools in the Upper Provinces are of that race. But to all, whether Natives of Bengal, or of the Western Provinces, (of the former I confine the following remarks to those resident out of their Native Province,) the education offered in the Government Schools appears unsuitable to the wants of the people; that required is a plain practical one, at present of the most simple kind; that attempted to be given, is of a high literary and scientific nature. Not that I mean to deprecate the latter, when administered to suitable recipients; far from it; but let a race of people resort to our Schools, by whose such an education would be appreciated, and to whom it would be serviceable; then give them the best procurable. At present it appears the vernacular dialects ought to be more attended to. In all large cities there should be good schools, under European supervision, for Hindu and Oordoo, especially the former: next to vernacular schools we should have English ones, in which a plain system of tuition should be pursued, adapted to prepare the students for inferior offices under Government; lastly, a few institutions of a higher order, in which instruction should be carried out as far as practicable; the most promising pupils from the vernacular and inferior schools might be promoted, as should be found expedient, to the superior ones. With a view to the further encouragement and diffusion of genuine learning throughout the country; this being, it is presumed, the real object to be kept in view, in offering an English education to the Natives, a rule should be established that no one should be eligible for public employment, unless, besides the more official qualifications, possessed of an education correspondent with the situation the candidate aspired to. A Native Judge, besides a knowledge of his duties, ought to be a man of more extended information than a man who is only an English writer or copyist; yet this is very rarely the case at present. The introduction of English, as the language of the Courts of Judicature, would be almost as great an error as the retention of Persian; but if all Court Officers, Vakeels, &c. &c., after a certain date, say seven or eight years, were required to possess a respectable acquaintance with English literature before their appointment, the Government would possess, in a short time, a class of well educated men, candidates for employment, and at the present time the schools would be resorted to by persons of greater respectability than is now the case; there would be a motive for learning English; the education offered would be the road to those substantialities of life, that all men are eager in the pursuit of.

It may be objected, that to lower the tone of education in any of the Government Schools would be to lessen their respectability; that though Mathematics, &c., may not be of immediate use, yet the boy, grown up to man, will pursue his reading, and after the toilsome labours of the day, will seek recreation in mental pursuits: this may be true, and would apply, were the people of this country sufficiently advanced to appreciate the benefit and pleasures to be derived from mental pursuits. In European countries, the instruction a boy receives at school is generally the foundation of a structure, the elevation of which depends upon his future diligence and perseverance. In India it too often happens to be a hut-house plant, raised with great difficulty, which droops and withers when removed from the general atmosphere in which it was cherished. In more favoured lands, the mechanic and peasant enjoy, in company with the philosopher and man of taste, the ever varying and increasing stores of information prevented to their view.

On a reference to the published Reports of the General Committee of Public Instruction, it appears no regularity attends the routine of Education pursued; the Principals and Masters of Colleges and Schools seem to follow their own individual plans; select their own books, &c. &c. This is right and proper within certain limits, but when unlimited, it may, and often does lead, to a desultory course of tuition. Either from motives of display, or from want of method, judging from the Reports, the pupils of some of the schools have no reason to complain of a paucity of subjects for study. This want of system leads to the consideration of the necessity of one Normal School, at least, in which teachers should be properly trained. The selection of instructors by the General Committee, has, in most cases, been judicious, and many valuable servants have they in their employ; but even they may possibly be capable of improvement. We go not to an amateur physician, nor to an amateur lawyer for advice, nor do amateur tailors, (if such exist) obtain much custom. If it be necessary that in other professions and occupations men should go through a course of systematic training, why should not teachers be taught their art?

But one point remains to be noticed before closing this prolix letter. If common report speaks truth, several of the best servants of the General Committee have left their employment, and sought situations in other departments under Government; and very great dissatisfaction exists among others. This must frequently be attended with inconvenience, if not with injury to the schools. The teachers in Government Schools are, generally speaking, well paid; so, doubtless, they ought to be, since they have arduous duties to perform, and are mostly men of education and respectability; but to keep such men in their too often idle occupation, (especially in India, where there are so many openings for Europeans,) something more than remuneration for present labour appears necessary. In all departments, the individuals, high or low, employed, have promotion, pension and furlough, if not within immediate reach, at least within view and for the General Committee to keep its valuable servants in its employ, to secure the aid and abilities of qualified men, some hopes beyond the present day should be held out. The Professorships at Calcutta, Benares and Agra, if not lucrative situations, afford the means of comfort, and might, together with other superior situations, if such exist, be held out as steps of promotion. Surely there are men in the service, who, after years of labour, either are fit, or might be fitted, for the occupancy of these higher situations. Society is a matter of opinion, and no man can be forced into the different grades of it against the will of those who walk therein; yet if Schoolmasters met with more attention and courtesy, their sphere of usefulness would be enlarged. The Natives are shrewd observers; they pay great respect to their own teachers; with them outward form goes very far; they quickly discover upon what footing a man stands with other members of the European community, and they can feel little desire for the acquisition of learning, when they perceive the teachers of it treated, if not with disrespect, at least with coldness and neglect.

In conclusion, let the English Education offered, be suited to the wants of the applicants for it, and make a road to office; above all, let really efficient tuition in the vernacular dialects be given; hold out encouragement to teachers to remain in the service of the Committee, and not to make it merely a stepping stone to other situations; be a uniform system introduced, and very soon English Schools will flourish, as well in the Mofussil, as they do at the Presidency.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,

UNCOVENANTED DEPUTY COLLECTOR.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR, — Sorry I am, that any "effusion" of mine should have called forth the remarks contained in a letter, signed A. D. C., under Reg. IX. in your paper of the 17th, and still more sorry should I be, did I conceive that they were founded on just grounds. Although the tone of the letter referred to, would justify me in keeping a "dignified silence," yet lest others should follow the lead of A. D. C., I beg to assure you, that I had not the slightest idea of "gratuitously insulting," or of directly or "indirectly" impugning the character, "for efficiency," of any body of men, particularly one which has done, and is doing such good service, as the European U. D. Collector. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than seeing them, and Natives also, advanced to the highest situations under Government, if fit for the duty. My letter was only written with a view to add my feeble voice in favour of the advancement of Natives to situations of trust and dignity, which I have advocated, do now, and please God, always will.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,

PHILIPKID.

P. S. I send you my name and address, that your Correspondent may not accuse me of doing anything "indirectly," or anonymously, that I would not do in my own name and directly; and as a dispute about words can be of no interest to any one, but those concerned, he had better address himself direct to me, if he has anything to say.

NOTES.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR, — With reference to your editorial, headed "Official Separation from Idolatry," I should like to know what is the difference between a Hindoo coming into Court, and calling upon his God, and the old form of oath? If he is to call upon our God, or Almighty God, as in the Act, it will be a force, and discretionary to all parties. If he is to call on the form, I do not observe the great benefit obtained; but if a man has such a tender conscience that he cannot administer a heathen oath, (he will do the same after the passing of the Act as now,) he might resign the Service; as with what consistency can he deprecate the proceeds of which will go to the support of a Temple? I should designate such persons as fit and fagot men, if they had the power,

If the Almighty permits the existence of Hindoos and Moosulmen, I do not see why we are to exterminate them. We may try to convert them, but nothing more.

I can assure you, not one more respectable witness will enter the Courts, after the passing of this Act, than before. Respectable people objected to appearing in the Court, and to being cross-questioned.

On hearing of this Act, a Native remarked to me, that it was not good, as the distinction between the respectable witness and the lowest of the low, would be removed, when all made a declaration.

Hoping that each man may perform the duty allotted to him on earth,

I remain,

Your obedient servant,

J.

TETOTALISM.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—I have long, with much grief, observed in the Friend of India, very uncalculated and mis-timed remarks on tetotalism. I, for one, have reaped great benefit from being a tetotaler; and am therefore bound, in gratitude to God, to speak, and do all in my power for the cause. For I have found, by experience, (as thousands have done before me,) that half measures, in the use of intoxicating drinks, were not safe—that I did not require them—that they were not necessary for the good of my health—that the use of them, as a beverage, was likely to be the undoing of my never-dying soul, if not my body, too; as has been the case in thousands of instances—that, perhaps, more than three-thirds of the human race never saw them; and as regards health, have, as good, if not better health, than those who allow themselves the use of intoxicating beverages.

Oh, Sirs! if you had seen as much of beer and wine drinking as I have, you would not take every opportunity of insinuating against those, who, seeing the great evil that the use of those drinks are daily doing, think it their duty to rise up in arms against these enemies of our unhappy race. You, Sirs, are under the influence of religion, and you have the strong bonds of the grace of God to keep you from being led away by the insinuating nature of intoxicating drinks: but "All men have not faith;" and some of us poor ignorant soldiers see, blessed be God, that the wise man's advice is stronger than the Friend of India's, when he says, "Wine is a mocker, and strong drink is raging;" and "LOOK NOT at the wigs;" and, again, "Seek not mixed wine." Oh, Sirs, I have seen more ill come from wine and beer-drinking, than ever I did from spirit-drinking. I have seen my unhappy father often kick my poor, good, and affectionate mother about the house, and break every piece of crockery, &c., in the house; to return which, we, the poor offending children, have had often to go supperless to bed, and with a sore back into the bargain, while he was under the influence of beer. Ah! and to furnish which, and to be able to indulge in it the more freely, he at last left my poor mother, sick as she was, with five little helpless children to provide for, and enlisted into the army; and being (as the use of intoxicating drinks invariably has a tendency to effect), quite void of natural feelings, got himself shipped for India. So that she could not follow him with so many little children, poor as she was. When I was 14, I enlisted in the same Regiment, and came out to India to him; but the same unhappy propensity followed him here; so that the pleasure I hoped to find in him, was not to be obtained, except I could do the same as himself. This, Sirs, and more than this, has been done for my family; (for I never recollect him drinking any thing else of an intoxicating nature while in his native village,) and if all was known, this is nothing to the misery and wretchedness that beer-drinking has brought upon hundreds of families. But people may turn up the nose and say, "pshaw! I would not give a place for any man, who could not take a glass of beer without doing such things as you speak of." Yes, and so said my poor father once; but as the old saying is, "we must creep before we walk," so in becoming drunkards, we must have a commencement, and beer is the drink, the arch enemy generally commences with, in his misery-making. For who ever heard of one becoming a sot all at once? But because good people in high-life can, perhaps, drink beer without making themselves drunk, (?) shall they embrace every opportunity to shake the hands of those who have the humanity to deny themselves of beer and wine, and show to the rising generation, and all others who will hear and take the friendly warning?

Yes, Sirs, as you would not wish to encourage and aid the enemy of our race, in destroying souls, I beseech you, and all others, to cease discouraging your poor, weak and tempted fellow creatures from putting far from them that which has every likelihood of ruining their soul and body. Ad for tetotalers being intemperate in their zeal against drunkenness, and the cause of drunkenness, we can truly say, that if all the world were tetotalers, there would be no drunkards; but sure we are, that while good men advocate the drinking of "sot" and wine, drunkenness will never be chased from the earth. And if people like their beer too well to give it up for the good of others, we humbly ask that they will not, at least, by any means, discourage those who are determined, by the help of God, that the vast amount of intemperance in the world shall not lie at their doors.

Yes, till you can vouch that beer and wine shall not send souls, by thousands, to hell yearly—shall not make unnatural husbands and fathers—shall not make disobedient children—shall not fill the soldier's guard-house and hospitals—in fine, till you can vouch that all the evil arising from drinking intoxicating drinks, shall be instantly annihilated, we will not cease to risk the charge of intemperance in our endeavours to put a stop to the strikes of the many-headed monster, drunkenness. Can a man, who has just been burnt by his house being on fire, when he has escaped, perhaps, with great difficulty, be charged with intemperance in his endeavours to save the rest of his family who are every minute in danger of losing their lives, because he may risk himself a little for their salvation; no more should tetotalers be charged with rashness and intemperance, because they warn men against drinking beer and wine, &c., because they are dangerous and of no use, especially to men in health.

I hope, Sirs, that you will be kind enough to give this a place in your paper, or else send it to me again, so that I may send it where it will be published.

Yours, in much respect and humility,

HICKLIER.

Fort William.

DECLINE OF THE MAHOMMEDAN POWER. To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—Your first editorial, in No. 251 of the Friend, shows us that your attention has been strongly drawn to the decline of the Mahommedan power. Your remarks have induced me to put together a few thoughts, that, in consequence of passing events, have occurred to myself. Were we to ask the question: For what purposes have the English been brought to India, the reply might be: For many good purposes. But there is one purpose, not, I apprehend, an ultimate one, which, at present, appears exceedingly prominent, and almost forces itself on the observation of every reflecting person. I would express it thus: The English have been brought to India for the purpose of destroying the Mahommedan power here. All the countries in India, once under the Mahommedans, are now under the government or predominant influence of the English. The Mahommedan power is destroyed; its ruins only remain, and they are fast disappearing. That career of conquest, which has led to this happy result, was commenced by Clive; and an over-ruling Providence has directed the English arms, always followed by victory, chiefly to those parts of eastern Asia, in which the Mahommedan power existed. Are not the Mahratta country and Assam the only heathen countries, of importance, not previously brought under the Mahommedan sway or influence, which the English have conquered in India? Why have the English been thus brought into contact with all the Mahommedan States in India, and thus humbled every one of them, while they have had so little collision with the heathen states, and have made so few conquests among them? Why has the current of conquest set to the south-west, the west, and the north-west, while so little territory has been obtained on the south-east, the east, and the north? The reason is now very apparent. The English were directed to conquer just a where the Mahomedan power existed; and where that was not, their conquests have been few and unimportant. The Burmahs, the Peguans, the Siamese, and other nations and tribes, on the south-east, the east, and the north, are nearer to the first seat of the British power, than many of the states in the north-west; and why were not they conquered? They are heathens; and the commission given by Providence to the English, as events have now shown, was to humble the Mahomedans. If any one will cast his eyes over the map of Hindoostan, he will see, that from Siam, all round to the Himalaya's and the Sutledge, the English dominions are now bounded by heathen states, and on the south and west by the ocean. Thus the work is done. What a vast extent of conquest through which the Mahomedan power has been annihilated!

The work done in India, the English have now been led, by the hand of Providence, across the Indus, to commence the same line of operations in Western Asia. With what remarkable proofs of a Divine interposition has the conquest of Afghanistan been attended! This last great event is, perhaps, the most wonderful. How confounding to the deluded votaries of the Prophet! How pleasing to the Christian! Much, very much of interest deep might be written on this great event. I wish some able pen would take up the subject, and exhibit it to us in all its important bearings. How far the English may yet advance, in the same career of conquest, who can tell; but what enlightened Christian can be indifferent to the present state of affairs in Persia, Turkey and Egypt. Who can help looking on with almost breathless anxiety, and longing to know the result? That result must be, that the Christian powers will be triumphant, and the crescent laid in the dust.

Constantinople was taken by the Turk in 1453; after that event the Mahomedan power was extended but little; the soldiers of the crescent soon ceased to conquer. And now a change, a great change, took place. Almost as soon as the Mahomedans ceased to conquer, the Christian powers began, at first slowly and gradually, but at length rapidly, to conquer the Mahomedans. Only thirty-four years after the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks, the Portuguese came to India, and began to annoy the Mahomedans, and curtail their power. The Dutch followed, and soon prostrated the Mahomedan power in the Eastern Archipelago. The Russians extended their power over the Mahomedan tribes in their vicinity; and they have, within these few years, broken the power of Persia and Turkey. The French have established themselves, and they will not fail to extend their power, among the Mahomedans in the north of Africa. While these events have been proceeding, the English have swept India. Little now remains to be done; and the Christian powers stand quite prepared to complete their work. Mahomedanism has been an awful curse to the world, and its annihilation will be a great blessing. We have been speaking only of the annihilation of its political power; but, doubtless, the total subversion of its destructive tenets will follow; of this, the poor deluded Mahomedans themselves have, happily for them, a strong presentiment.

* P. S. Your kind offer to furnish the public with occasional information concerning the best school books for sale at Thacker's, is most welcome to your readers in the country; but why not favour us poor rustics with a short notice sometimes of a few prime works of other descriptions? Your friend in town would be no loser by such a course.

OPPRESSION ON THE PART OF RYOTS.

*To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—While "The Act for amending the present rules for the Sale of Land for Arrears of Revenue," is under your Editorial consideration, I trust it may not be amiss to bring to your notice the defects of a portion of Regulation VIII. of 1851, (or of misconstruction by the Local Authorities,) which, although it may not strictly come within the scope of the amendment above alluded to, yet since its operation has been attended with, and is open to, evil, by bringing about the destruction of landed property, will be shown presently. I hope it may meet with your kind attention, and the ultimate removal of the evil complained of. It would appear that Sections 14, 15 and 16 of the Regulation above quoted, was enacted to prevent mischief and inconvenience arising from several claims being preferred, regarding the same matter, relating to arrears of rent, before different tribunals; and I believe it used to be systematically practiced by the strongest, the Zemindar, to annoy and harass his weaker opponent, the Ryot; but since the promulgation of the above Regulation, the practice seems to have been reversed; in as much as the Ryots now, if inclined to be refractory, play a game with the Zemindar, which very often ends in his ruination, by withholding the rents of their respective tenures, in defiance. Section 15 says, that "If it be brought to the notice of the Collector, that a suit is pending before him in a matter regarding which a regular suit has been previously filed in the Judge's Court, he shall suspend his proceedings, and forward the record of the case to the Judge, who will make over both cases to some tribunal, subject to his authority, or dispose of the cases himself." Taking advantage of this Section, the Ryots generally prefer a regular suit, either to contest a previous summary decision by the Collector, or to try the validity of the Zemindar's demand of rent, and thus throw their cases into a Civil Court, knowing well that they can, with a little management and villany, prolong the suits to a series of years; so that while their cases are pending there, should the Zemindar proceed to recover his rent by summary processes, they immediately petition to have the cases removed before the Civil tribunal, under the provision of the above Section. The Zemindar, in the mean time, if not rich enough to stand the shock which such proceedings entail upon his finances, must inevitably be ruined by the sale of his Talook for Government dues, which would fully accomplish the object of the Ryots.

I have known instances where the Revenue authority refused to transfer certain cases, when the claim preferred before him was for current revenue, while the cases pending before the Civil Court were regarding the rents of preceding or former years; but this objection, it would appear, was over-ruled by the Judge, who persisted in the Collector's sending the cases before him. Although being for the arrears of separate years, yet both being on account of "arrears or exactions of rent," were "the same matter;" and, consequently, cognizable by him under the provision of Section 15 above quoted. I am, however, of opinion, notwithstanding the ambiguity of these Sections, that the claim, for instance, of 1857, for which either party may have resorted to a Civil Court, and that of the current year, are neither one and "the same matter," nor "the same cause of action." Be that as it may; since it is not my intention to lay down rules, nor to enter logically into the merits of the Sections under consideration, but merely to point out an existing evil under the present practice of the Mofussil Courts, and having already "spun out my yarn" longer than I at first intended, I beg to conclude, by hoping you will, if you consider it worth your attention, draw the notice of the authorities to the subject, as also kindly favour me with your opinion of the meaning and construction of the three sections, and oblige,

Your obedient servant,

ADSCRIPTUS GLENN.

EDUCATION.

PLAN OF A NEW DIOCESAN BOARD OF EDUCATION.—At a meeting of the clergy of London, on Thursday week, the Bishop of the diocese explained the object he had in view. It was to constitute a board which should embrace the whole question and form of education as affecting all classes of the people, from the highest to the lowest, as far as they might be able; to be in communication and be made conversant with all systems of education, as applicable and as applied to instruction in the various schools within the metropolis, as far as the several promoters of such systems would permit; at the same time to act with the view of intermixing with these systems, but with the ultimate view of promoting a principle and a system of unity and uniformity of instruction and operation, and to open a constant and a regular source of communication among all the clergy of the diocese. The system of education as had been proposed by some parties on a recent occasion, if carried but to the extent which they had contemplated, most and would be a curse to man. It was important not only that education should be afforded to all, but that that education should be a religious education: and it was not necessary for him to tell those who were present, that when he spoke of education, of religious education, he meant a religious education in the principles of the Est-Étude d'Église. He called upon the Rev. J. S. Stone to read the proceedings of a providential meeting. Mr. Stone then read the following paper of resolutions:—1. London Diocesan Board of Education. A providential meeting, convened by the Bishop of London, its lordship being in the chair, the following resolutions were proposed and carried:—I. That it is expedient to form a board of education for the diocese of London, under the presidency of the Bishop. II. That the board consist of the president, and a certain number of vice-presidents, and other members, to be named by the president. III. That the following clergymen and laymen, having signified their consent to the president, be members of the board. Here follow a long list of names of persons of much influence and standing in the country. IV. That the board direct its attention to the following objects:—1. To form a medium of communication and mutual suggestions between the clergy and other persons of the diocese interested in the cause of religious and general education in accordance with the doctrines and principles of the Church of England. 2. To collect and circulate information as to the state of education in the diocese, and the obstacles which impede its progress or efficiency. 3. To take measures for the extension and improvement of education in connexion with the Church of England throughout the diocese. 4. To bring into union with itself as many as possible of the schools existing in the diocese, on the terms adopted by the National Society. 5. To appoint an efficient agent or agents, to visit and periodical examination of the schools in union with the board, with the concurrence of the managers of such schools, and under the sanction of the bishop. N.B. With regard to the objects of the board, a peculiarity is to be observed which distinguishes the diocese of London from the other dioceses of the kingdom. Two among the principal objects of the other diocesan boards are:—1. To institute schools for the training of ministers. 2. To establish, or take into union, middle or commercial schools. But in London, the former of these objects is about to be accomplished by the immediate establishment of a training institution, under the superintendence of the National Society; and the latter has been already in some measure accomplished by the Metropolitan Commercial Institution, which has a central school in Rose-street, Soho, and local schools in various parts. It is probable, however, that one or both of these objects will hereafter be brought under the attention of the diocesan board: which will put itself in immediate communication with the committee of the Metropolitan Commercial Institution. V. That in furtherance of its designs, it is desirable for the board:—1. To promote the formation of local or district boards in different parts of the diocese, which shall be in connexion and communication with the general Diocesan board. 2. To enter into union with the National Society, and transmit a periodical report of the inquiries and transactions of the board, so far as relates to the education of the poor: as also to invite the co-operation of other societies or institutions for education, established in the diocese on the principles of the Church of England. The resolutions were unanimously passed, a subscription was commenced, and the meeting separated.—Christ. Adv.

SCIENTIFIC.

COPPER IN FOOD.—"There was an idea once prevalent, that the colour of the green tea was to be ascribed to the drying the leaves on copper; but nothing can be more unfounded than such an opinion, as the pans, one of which was sent home by an officer of the London Company, are cast-iron. The copper may be detected in tea is true; but Bucholz has shown that it exists in several vegetables; indeed, he is so proof that it enters into the composition of a great proportion of animal and vegetable matter. It is found in coffee in very striking quantities; from ten ounces of unroasted coffee, there may be obtained, by the proper manipulations a dense precipitate, which will coat two inches of horse-shoe wire with metallic copper. And he who eats a sandwich, has much more to fear from the poisonous effects of this metal, than the drinker of green tea; for the two slices of bread, the beef, and the mustard, all have been proved, by the examination of the chemist, to be capable of forming in the stomach a metallic crust; indeed, the only safe food would be potatoes, for in three pounds no copper could be traced."—Dr. G. G. Sigmund, on Tea

TEA MANUFACTURE.—"The proprietor of the tea-farm must not only understand agriculture, but he must likewise be acquainted with the laws that govern vegetable life; he must know the precise moment at which the leaves are imbued with their rich essence; he must judge when they are to be gathered for the delicacy of their flavour, and when for that coarser taste which suits the palate of his customer. In picking he must be very careful, lest he injure the egg in the early spring, and thus prevent the development of the seed and third gatherings, which, though not of equal value, are of much importance to him. He must likewise be aware of the adjustment of the heat necessary for the drying and curing the leaves; upon which, probably, quite as much depends as upon the state of maturity to which the leaves have arrived. These minutiae, which to the superficial observer appear but of little moment, are of the greatest consequence."

Our transatlantic friends are extremely fond of single and twain, which are prepared as follows:—1. The leaves are dried over the flames of burning indigo; and a very small quantity mixed with powdered gypsum, is delicately sprinkled over them, which adds to the colour. Different modes of flavouring the tea are likewise practised; the blossom buds of fragrant flowers are thrown amongst the finest tea. In the Loochin Pekoe these are very discernible. After fermentation has taken place in the iron pans devoted for that purpose, the dried leaves are delicately touched with a sweet-leaved pencil, which has been dipped in spirituous solution of redness and aromatic gums; and for the purpose a number of children are employed.—Dr. Sigmund.

MISCELLANEOUS.

LIBERATION OF THE CANADIAN PRISONERS.—"The result of the long-contested point arising out of the alleged illegal transportation of the nine untried prisoners from Upper Canada, and which have occupied so much of the time of our Courts of Law since last January, when they were brought up on writs of Habeas Corpus from Liverpool, has been the discharge of them all, namely, John Gombildy Parker, Randall Watson, William A. Jones, Robert Walker, Finley Walker, Leonard Watson, James Brown, Ira Anderson, and Paul Bedford. They were on Saturday, July 13th, released from their long confinement.—Pitt.

POOR-LAW COMMISSIONERS' NEW REPORT.—"The Fifth annual report of the Poor-law Commissioners has just appeared. The report is less lengthy than those of former years, and is confined, as regards England and Wales, to a brief account of the proceedings of the Commissioners during the last winter, and to a few observations on the peculiar circumstances which distinguished that period with reference to the administration of relief. It details the measures which have been adopted for introducing into Ireland the provisions of the Act (1 and 2 Vic. c. 36) of last session, for the more effectual relief of the destitute poor in Ireland. The tabular statements in the appendix to the report, represent that the number of paupers declared in England and Wales to be May 1, 1838, is 267; the number of parishes totalled, 13,411, of which the population is 11,751,845, and the average amount of rates for the year, 5,390,062. The number in England and Wales are therefore nearly complete; the whole number of parishes being 11,400, and the number united 13,411, having only 849. The report contains little of general interest with regard to England and Wales, except the second report of Dr. Kay on training children, according to the system introduced by him into Dr. Aulien's establishment at Norwood. In Ireland, the Commissioners seem to have met with no opposition, and they have accordingly formed nearly the whole Kingdom into unions. All the guardians have been elected.—Ibid.

BRIDWELL AND BETHLEHEM HOSPITALS.—"On Wednesday week, the Governors of Bridewell and Bethlehem Hospitals had their anniversary dinner in their spacious and elegant hall. Sir Peter Laurie, the President, was in the chair, supported by the Lord Mayor and 150 governors. Sir Peter Laurie, in the course of the evening stated, that the wings for the accommodation of 160 additional patients at Bethlehem Hospital were nearly ready, and when they were complete, the hospital would be the largest and most commodious in Europe. It was delightful to ascertain that 60 per cent. of individuals belonging to the families of the poor were restored to residential habits through the instrumentality of that institution. (Cheers.) In the house of occupation, instituted from the funds of Bridewell, in which helpless children were employed in learning trades, there were at present 120 inmates; 30 had been provided with situations during the year; the boys had been taught trades, and the girls had been taken as servants, and 14 had received rewards for good conduct. The New Bethlehem Hospital cost 25,000*l.*, and the addition to the house of occupation had caused an expenditure of 6,000*l.* It was most gratifying to him to state that the funds were so prudently managed as to enable the governors to increase the utility of both establishments.—Ibid.

MR. DUDLEY SINGLAIK, eldest son of the member for Calcutta, is actively engaged in preparing an expedition for New Zealand, consisting of two hundred settlers, all young and married, who have been employed by the Duke of Sutherland's extensive improvements in Sutherlandshire. The expedition will sail in August.—*Ibid.

PROGRESS OF IMPETUOSITY.—"The beauty, the harmony, and the vigour of the human frame, are soon altered by intemperance; her cheerful countenance is legitly impressed upon the countenance, the figure, voice, and gait. The good complexion, the manly bearing, the air of sincerity, visible in him who is guided by well-disciplined habits, strongly contrast with the downcast look of the sensualist, with his listlessness, his sluggish-er, his swollen and harsh features, his leprosy skin: the blooded face, the purple nose, the blotched cheek, the blood-shot eye, the loss of papulous and pustular eruptions, the loss of hair, the increased secretion from the mucous membrane of the nose, the faded and the languid lips, which bespeak the drunkard, may even turn him who does not actually intoxicate himself, but has daily potations beyond the limits of good sense. These are traits which are read by every eye; but there are more minute characters, which reveal to the attentive observer truths which the art of dissimulation would in vain attempt to conceal. The gin-drinker exhibits a sad picture: his languid countenance is of a leaden hue, his forehead is gathered into premature and ungraceful wrinkles, the eyes are dead, and lack lustre—they are anxious, restless—they cannot suppress the anxious look of their friends; the cheek is sallow; the complexion, sallow, affords stamp visibility in every line. Drunkenness gives a fiery redness, a fierce turgescence to the cheek; every vessel of the face is loaded to repletion; the eyes are bloodshot, the glare ferociously; every look betokens that in a moment a paroxysm of violence, rage, or madness, may burst forth; whilst the who best himself with beer exhibits all the marks of idleness; his face bears evident proofs of the ravages his beverage produces; it has a yellow hue; the cheeks are bloated; the nose and the lips are purple; the saliva streams from him; the feculence, with which he lifts his arm to his mouth, to brush away with the sleeve of his coat the accumulated froth, is a true indication of the sluggishness the liquor induces, which differs essentially from the forced energy and the ill-temper of the brandy, or the paralytic motion of the gin-drinker. The lover of vinous potations has his red nose, his raw eruptions on the face, his heavy eyes, his parched lips, and purple cheeks, as evidence of his rheumatic joys. The gin and the wine drinker becomes 'maudlin' in his cups; him apoplexy threatens: and the individual who flies to brandy to relief, and becomes furious and violent, may also thus terminate life suddenly; whilst he who becomes depressed, anxious, and melancholy, after the first stage of exhilaration is passed, will most probably be the victim of palsy.

"Dropsy, scirrhus, silver, gall-stones, epilepsy, a tendency to mortification on the slightest wound, various veins, gout, indurations of the important organs which assist digestion,—all threaten misery to the intemperate, and should awaken him to the sad folly of being led, for transient pleasure, to lasting agony and grief."—Dr. Sigmond.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY IN TYPE-FOUNDING.—A type-founder of Clermont, named Colson, has obtained a patent for a new material for printing types, which is harder, capable of more resistance, and yet less expensive than the ordinary composition of lead and antimony. It is well known that types cast from the latter soon become worn, especially since the introduction of machine printing. Colson asserts that the material is so hard that the types themselves will serve for punches in striking matrices, and that it will last ten years without being more worn than the usual composition is in one year. If experience should prove the new material to possess the quality claimed for it by the inventor, it must be of the utmost importance to printing in general, and to newspaper printing in particular.—Ibid.

LUXEDOUWANT.—M. Garcia de Tassy will publish in the course of a month the first volume of this "Histoire de la littérature Hindoustani." Report speaks most highly of the talent and research displayed in this work, and which promises to add to the high reputation of its distinguished author.—Ibid.

The Asiatic Society of Paris has elected Mrs. Davids, the talented mother of the late Arthur Lowmy Davids, a member of the association. This is the third lady distinguished by the two orders being the Princess Bogoloff, and the Countess Victorine de Clastres.—Ibid.

DUPUYTREN'S MODE OF OBTAINING HIS FEES.—He was often cheated by his patients, until he had recourse to the following ingenious device:—He had a faithful servant, who was stationed at the door of the hall. Dupuytren had two bells fixed over the porter's head, communicating with his eating-room.

On bowing the patient out, Dupuytren rang one of the two bells. If the fee was paid, one particular bell was rung, and the servant understood that all was right, and the patient was allowed to depart without any interruption. If the patient forgot the Baron's fee, the "two pay" bell was tingled, and the servant understanding the signal, addressed the patient very politely in the following manner:—"Mille pardons, Monsieur, I think you have forgotten to give the Baron his fee."—"Mon Dieu," exclaims the patient, "quelle negligence! je vous adresse mes excuses au Baron." Notwithstanding Dupuytren's immense wealth, he lived in quite a different way from what persons of his rank live in this country. He occupied only one suite of apartments—a floor, as we call it—and it was owing to this circumstance that he had it not in his power to prevent a ball from taking place in the room immediately over his head, a night or two before he died; and which it is said, greatly disturbed his dying moments.—Physic and Physicians.

VIENNA, July 15.—After the receipt of the news of the death of the Sultan, Rifaat Bey, the Turkish Ambassador, had a three hours' conference with Prince Metternich. The inhabitants of Vienna have not forgotten that in the time of Napoleon, and in the greatest distress of Austria, Sultan Mahmud could never be persuaded to make a diversion in favour of France. There was a time when he might have thrown a great weight in the balance of Europe. The Emperor Francis never forgot this; and it is remembered that on the news of the battle of Navarino, he said, "This is a disgrace to diplomacy." It is affirmed that on his death-bed he conjured his family always to bear in mind the friendly conduct of the Porte. It is, therefore, natural that great regret is felt here at the early death of the Sultan, who always showed himself a friend to the Christians.—Put.

MEXICO.—The beautiful MS. in the library of this town, containing in Polyglot Lord's Prayer, with the order of services by Albert Dürer, is about to be published by Cotta, in close imitation of the original, by coloured lithography. The title will be—"Oratio Domini in Polyglotta singularium linguarum characteribus expressa, et delineationibus Alberti Düreri cineta, edita a F. X. Hueger, &c." The size is folio, and the price, we expect, will be about twenty to twenty-five shillings.—For. Quar. Rec.

VIENNA JOURNALS.—The following account of the circulation of the Vienna journals is taken from the Nepereburg Correspondent:—"Official Gazette, 2800; Austria's Observer, 600; The Eagle, 370; Theatrical Gazette, 1,300; Illustrator, 451; Vienna Journal, 600; Spectator, 750. A non-political journal, the Shareholder, is to appear next year, as well as a literary paper in French.—Ibid.

10,000,000 volumes are printed in Germany and 50,000 authors (annually).—Ibid.

THORVALDSEN.—The subscription for the intended Thorvaldsen Museum at Copenhagen, not having amounted to a sufficient sum for erecting an edifice worthy of its object, the king has appropriated to this purpose the wing of the new place at Christiansberg, which stands between the chapel and the menagerie. Thorvaldsen is already busily employed in arranging this building for its new destination, and, as soon as this task is finished, intends to return to Rome.—Ibid.

SWEDEN.—According to recent calculations, which we find in the Stockholm paper, the actual population of Sweden amounts to 2,025,140 souls, showing an increase of one-fifth since his present Majesty was called to the throne.—Ibid.

AMERICAN COIN.—The Golden Eagle.—The stamping of this superb coin has commenced at the mint of Philadelphia: it is 24 years since any of this coin was struck, the coinage ceasing in 1814, because the erroneous standard of our gold caused it to be exported.—Ibid.

FIRE IN AUGUSTA.—NARROW ESCAPE OF MR. BUCKINGHAM AND FAMILY.—(From the Georgia Constitutionalist, of June 20.)—Yesterday morning, about half-past two o'clock, a fire broke out in the Planters' Hotel in this city, and the building being entirely of wood, except the basement story, it was quickly wrapped in flames, and consumed with astonishing rapidity. Among the families staying at the hotel was that of Mr. Buckingham, the oriental traveller, his lady, and son. He had returned late from the delivery of his first lecture on Palestine in the Presbyterian church, and sitting up reading for some time after, he had not long retired to rest when the alarm of fire was first given, but the flames then burning out in a room next to the hotel, he was enabled to bring out his family in perfect safety; his faithful man-servant, however, a native of Ireland, in remaining too long to assist in saving as much of the property as could be rescued from the flames had to lower down the trunk by a rope of bed-sheets tied together, from the bed-room window, and, throwing out after these all the mattresses and feather beds at hand, he leapt on to them from a height of more than twenty feet, every particle out of the house being then blocked up by flames, and received a slight injury from the fall; but medical attendance being immediately procured, he is expected speedily to recover. Mr. Buckingham's manuscripts and papers were all saved.

ed, and a good portion of his personal effects, though, from the suddenness of the alarm and the rapidity of the flames, many valuable articles of property and apparel were unavoidably consumed. The family were kindly and hospitably received by Mr. and Mrs. Braden, nearly opposite to the hotel, in Broad-street, at whose house they still remain.

ARABIA.—Earl Munster is, we understand, preparing for the press some interesting military annals from the Arabian.—For. Quar. Rev.

GOVERNMENT NOTIFICATIONS.

ORDERS BY THE HONOURABLE THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR OF BENGAL.

Mr. George Alexander, Post Master General of Bengal, has been permitted to be absent from his duties on leave for six weeks, from the 14 proximo, under Medical Certificate, preparatory to his applying for leave to sea.

The Honourable the President in Council has been pleased to direct Mr. S. G. Palmer to take charge of the General Post Office until further orders.

H. V. BAYLEY, Offg. Dy. Sec. to Govt. of India.

The 21st October, 1889.

In reference to the instruction of the Honourable Court of Directors, conveyed in para. 7 of their Dispatch No. 18, dated the 31st July 1889, the Right Honourable the Governor General is pleased to publish, for general information, the following copy of that Dispatch:—

25. We have perused these proceedings with the deepest concern, and greatly lament the dejection and sufferings of the Native population of all classes during the continuance of this calamity. The excitement inseparable from such visitations and the extensive loss of life are likewise much to be deplored.

26. The amount* mentioned by you as expended by the local authorities in the Acra Division alone, 13,000/000.

In alleviating the distress and averting the misery which at one period threatened to be so extensive and fatal in its effects, is commendable and the Revenue which you have directed to be suspended, and which we far more ultimately be relinquished, in order to relieve the unfortunate Landholders and Ryots from all anxiety on that account, is large in amount.

* About Rupees 30,000/000.

4th.—It is however extremely gratifying to find that you were enabled to employ the "staying population" on works of public utility, and that a large portion of the community was preserved from destruction by the prompt and timely measures you adopted; these appear to us to have been dictated by a wise, humane, and liberal policy.

About 2,500,000 persons were daily employed at these districts, and we deem most advisable, the sentiments we have now expressed.

5th.—It is also very satisfactory to learn that the prospects of the current season are most propitious, and that some slight remains of the past season.

6th. The efforts made by Mr. R. C. Hamilton, the Commissioner, and the harassing duties performed with so much zeal and efficiency by that officer and those under his control, fully merited the approbation bestowed on them.

7th. We greatly regret that any gentleness should have taken place on the part of the Native to whom the duty of making daily payments to the destitute was entrusted; but we are happy to observe that, generally, the conduct of the Zemindars in the neighbouring districts, and other superior classes of Native, in subscribing to relieve their suffering countrymen, was most exemplary at this distressing period, and we deem that you will make generally known, in such manner as you may deem most advisable, the sentiments we have now expressed.

8th. We concur in the acknowledgments conveyed to the Revenue J. Moore*, who appears to have rendered important and valuable services to aid of the local authorities on this occasion.

Fagan, Officiating Magistrate and Collector at Mynpoor, has obtained leave of absence, on Medical Certificate, for two months, from the 30th instant; or such date as he may quit his station; preparatory to his applying for Furlough to England, on sick Certificate. The Commissioner of the Acra Division has been instructed to make the best arrangement that circumstances will admit of for carrying on the duties of the District, should Mr. Fagan be obliged to leave the station before his successor may have joined.

Mr. C. W. Fagan, Officiating Joint Magistrate and Deputy Collector of Gorakhpur, has obtained leave of absence, for a fortnight, in extension of the leave for one month, granted to him by the Commissioner of the Hill Division, from the 9th September, 1887.

The 13th October, 1889.

Mr. S. Bowring, Deputy Collector of Customs in Bundelkhand, reported on the 23rd ultimo, his arrival at the Presidency on board the ship "John Fleming," on his return from the Cape of Good Hope, under the leave of absence granted to him by the Government of Bengal, on the 21st September, 1887.

The 17th October, 1889.

Mr. J. S. Clarke to officiate as Additional Sessions Judge of Allypore, for the purpose of taking up and disposing of such commitments of the Allypore and Boudlandkhand Districts as may be now ready for trial at the Sessions.

Mr. H. Lawin to officiate as Magistrate and Collector of Mynpoor, during the absence of Mr. Fagan on leave granted to him on the 18th instant or till further orders.

Mr. W. R. Mosey to officiate as Special Deputy Collector of Meerut, on being relieved of the office of Collector of Customs at Mirzapore by Mr. G. Todd.

The 18th October, 1889.

The Reverend J. J. Tucker, Chaplain of Saugor, has been permitted to remain at Simla till the 15th November next; in further extension of the leave of absence granted to him on Medical Certificate, on the 27th January, 1888.

Brevet Major J. H. Mackinlay, Post Master of Cawnpore, has obtained leave of absence, on his private affairs, for five months, from the 3d proximo to proceed to Calcutta, preparatory to submitting an application for Furlough to Europe.

THE PRECURSOR STEAMER.—We have waited till the discussion, elicited by Mr. Taitou's proposal, to start a Precursor Steamer had been, in a measure, brought to a close, before we ventured to offer any opinion on the subject; and we must confess, that nothing which has been advanced in the various correspondence with which the papers have been filled, has shaken our confidence in the perfect feasibility, and even necessity, of the scheme. As is it regards the probabilities of an adequate return from the Precursor, it must be obvious, that whatever objections apply to it, must apply with equal force to a larger scheme. If a Steamer once a quarter will not pay, still less will a monthly vessel realize the expectations which may be formed. If a plan which provides for two profitable voyages out of the four, must be a losing one, a larger plan, which must necessarily embrace a larger proportion of comparatively unprofitable voyages, must entail still greater loss.

If the Comprehensive Steam Plan is to provide vessels on both sides the Isthmus, and to embrace the European, as well as the Asiatic Navigation, we cannot but think that it will inevitably fail. Three years ago, before the French Government had perfected its line of steamers between Marseilles and Alexandria, and before Austrian vessels were in the field, so vast a scheme was by no means out of place. But circumstances are materially altered. The Mediterranean has been covered with British and Foreign Steam Vessels: and it is certain, that if another set of vessels was provided on the European side of the Isthmus by the Indian Steam Company, scarcely one-half the passengers who might leave India in their Comprehensive Vessels, would avail themselves of them. It is unwise, therefore, to encumber our plans with a double series of vessels, after the efforts which have been so successfully made by other parties to facilitate the communication between Egypt and Europe. We consider this a most auspicious circumstance, in as much as it abridges half our labour, cuts off half our expenditure, and so simplifies our arrangements, as to place the accomplishment of them within our grasp. The European communication being already complete, we have nothing farther to do, than to set vigorously about the Asiatic portion of the navigation.

But then comes the great question, whether the starting of a Precursor Steamer is likely to endanger the great Comprehensive Plan; in other words, whether starting one steamer a quarter, will effectually prevent our possessing a steamer once a month, or even lessen the probability of it. We cannot but think that it will not; that, on the contrary, it will materially aid the accomplishment of our larger and more ambitious wishes. We can have little hope from England. The Directors are more than backward respecting the Comprehensive Plan; they are actually hostile to it; and as long as it is made part and parcel of that plan, that the Mail shall be conveyed by an expensive and round about voyage to Alexandria, instead of being sent, as at present, directly through France, we cannot think their opposition unreasonable. But it is unreasonable and narrow-minded in the Governors of this great Empire to cut off the greater part of India from participating in the benefits of steam navigation, upon the niggardly and selfish plea, that their little go to Bombay answers their own purpose. But, whether reasonable or unreasonable, there is the fact, that the Court of Directors are decidedly hostile to embarking in the Comprehensive Scheme. And Her Majesty's Government is indis-warn, notwithstanding all the fine speeches and letters of Sir John Hobhouse. Every communication received from England within this year, has represented the Directors as completely under the guidance and control of the Ministry; as having been reduced to a state of pitiable subserviency to the Board in Cannon Row. If this be true to any extent, it is obvious that the Ministry might long since have carried the Comprehensive Plan into execution, notwithstanding the opposition of the Directors. But while they have been putting India off with talk, what has been their conduct with regard to America? We beg the reader's particular attention to an extract, which we annex to this article, from the Globe of August. He will there find that the Ministry has entered, heart and soul, into a vast comprehensive scheme, which shall embrace the interests of that vast continent, and connect it with Europe by a line of magnificent vessels, at the same time that a rapid communication is established between its different ports, whether under the dominion of Britain or not. They will read with surprise, that this vast plan is to include also, a line of vessels from the Isthmus of Panama across the Pacific, to the youngest daughter of the civilized world; and that a voyage from London to Sydney and back again, will, it is calculated, be thus brought within the compass of five months. Viewing the very opposite conduct pursued by the Ministry towards the East and the West, are we not justified in assuming, that little reliance can be placed on any hope which rests on them? If this assumption be correct, it is assuredly far better for us to betir ourselves, and get up a quarterly communication, than to wait two or three years more, or an indefinite period, for any communication at all.

If, however, we should happily be incorrect in our conjectures; and if the Directors and Ministry are upon the eve of assisting the Comprehensive Scheme, we do not see how the immediate establishment of one vessel should induce them instantly to give up all idea of so doing. Such a line of policy would be totally at variance with that wisdom, from which alone their patronage of the Comprehensive Plan could be expected. We think that the early accomplishment of a portion of the plan, would rather increase, than slacken, the eagerness of the Home Authorities to carry the remainder of it into execution. They must be fully aware, that although one vessel might pay, without official encouragement, the establishment of vessels adequate to a monthly communication, must indispensably require it. They are not likely, therefore, to imbibed the notion, that we can go on without them. If it should happen that the Directors and Ministry are half inclined to support the scheme, the launching of the Precursor will, in all probability, bring them to an immediate determination, by animating the friends of Indian Steam Navigation at home to greater urgency in their appeals. It would also stimulate the mercantile community generally to embark in a scheme, already in part accomplished; and give an impulse to the public mind, which the fruitless negotiation of so many years has comparatively benumbed. The step which has been taken in Calcutta, therefore, appears, under every consideration, to be wise; and we have no doubt that subsequent events will justify this conclusion. The following is the statement of the Globe:

"We have learned from an authentic source, and communicate to our readers with much satisfaction, the fact that Government have concluded a contract with a powerful company, established under the direction of some of the first-rate merchants and capitalists in the City, to convey the mails by steam twice every month from England to the West Indies, and from the West Indies to the United States and Halifax, by very powerful steam-vessels which are to be built for this special purpose. This extensive and well-combined operation embraces every colony, British and Foreign, and the coast of America from Surinam to New Orleans; at the same time furnishing all these countries with a connected line of packets for correspondence and passengers with each other and with New York and Halifax, as well as with Europe by the direct line from this country to and from the West Indies. The course of post with the West Indies from London to London again will be 36 days, with abundance of time at every place (from three days to 15 days as may be)—Jamaica will have ten days to reply to letters; and besides their ordinary course of post as just mentioned, Barbadoes, Grenada, St. Thomas, and Porto Rico, and also a portion of Hayti, will be able to communicate in 43 days.

"We hear also that it is contemplated to connect with this plan a line of sailing packets from Panama to Sydney, by which the course of post between that place and London might be brought to about five months.

"The bargain made for the performance of this most important and wide extended service, we hear, reasonable on the part of the contractors and liberal on the part of Government. It is also but justice to the latter to state that they entered into this great measure with the utmost readiness, and with the most anxious desire to benefit and to advance the great commercial and colonial interests of this country; and as the plan and all its combinations become known, there, we feel convinced, will be acknowledged by all to be the greatest boon ever conferred by any Government upon the colonial and the commercial interests of this country. On the British colonies in the western world, and all South America, and every place on the Gulf of Mexico, it must confer incalculable and lasting benefits. Placed in the heart as it were of the great continent of America, the moving power of this mighty combination and rapid communication will spread its invigorating influence to places and to vast rich countries hitherto comparatively unknown and inaccessible, and from which every nation in the world, and Great Britain in particular, will derive the greatest advantages. It will tend to the peaceable consolidation of the different states of the New World, by increasing the industry and the wealth of their people; and, consequently, enabling these States to repay the heavy debts which they owe to British subjects. The whole plan will be found to be worthy of this country, and to confer credit and honour upon the Government and the Post-office establishment thereof, and also upon every one who has been engaged in planning and arranging this most important measure."

HINDOO FEMALE EDUCATION; BY FRICILLA CHAPMAN.

—The title of Mrs. Chapman's work is too general to suit its contents. The publication is intended to attract more earnestly the regard and patronage of benevolent people at home, to the Central School of the Ladies' Society in Calcutta, Mrs. Wilson's Orphan Refuge at Agrapara, and other institutions of the same nature, and in the same connection, in different parts of Bengal and the Western Provinces. Having, therefore, a partial object, it presents a partial narrative. The partiality, however, is not entire; and it is very far from being of an injurious character. Mrs. Chapman introduces the Native Female Schools of the Independents and Baptists with a frankness and warmth of commendation highly honourable to her. But it was not her business to give a full report of their progress; and she does not appear to have had the means of doing so, if she had wished to do it. She says enough of them to prevent the impression being made, that no efforts are used in India for female education except in the institutions for which she has to plead; or that their system is so superior as to give them any paramount claim to public support.

The first part of Mrs. Chapman's volume contains a view of Native life and society, intended to show the importance of female education; and although it is singularly desultory, and not unfrequently incorrect, it is yet sufficiently true to produce a general impression not materially erroneous. It is, moreover, lively and picturesque; and it is pervaded by a genial kindness and cheerfulness of disposition. Mrs. Chapman appears to be fully aware of the deep degradation of her own sex in India, and to be affected by it, as we should expect a pious and cultivated lady would be; and, at the same time, she is neither insensible to what is good and pleasing in our Native women, nor does she take such things for more than they are worth. And it is a rare and difficult thing, to keep to so just a medium, between the contemptuous disgust and the injudicious partiality which may both in time be excited by the Native character.

In her eighth chapter, Mrs. Chapman proceeds to the proper business of her volume—the history of those efforts in Native Female Education, which began with the arrival of Miss Cooke, now Mrs. Wilson, in 1821; and a very interesting history it is. Native female education did not exactly originate with that lady. For years before her arrival in India, a female school had been successfully conducted by Mrs. W. Carey, at Cutwa, at the expense of the second Mrs. Dr. Carey; and at the time of her arrival, the Baptist Missionaries in Calcutta had likewise succeeded in a commencement of the work in the metropolis. But her arrival, and much more the energy and devotedness of her character and labours, gave to the enterprise a vigour so new and so powerful, that it seemed thenceforward to be peculiarly her own, whoever might take a share in it. We will not endanger our continued enjoyment of Mrs. Wilson's friendship, by reminding her accordingly to her due. Nor is it necessary. Every one feels that India is beyond measure indebted to her intrepidity, zeal and indomitable perseverance in the education of her daughters. Her career is marked by three epochs—the first formation of her circle of Native Schools—the opening of her Central School—and the institution of the Orphan Refuge at Agrapara; and it is remarkable that the course of most, if not all, who have laboured in the same work, has partaken of similar troubles. Mrs. Wilson in one year had formed eight schools, which were attended by two hundred and seventeen girls; and in two years after, the numbers had more than doubled. She found, in fact, what others have done, that the limitation of Native Female Schools, when once fairly introduced, is derived from deficiency of superintendents and funds, rather than the rejection of the offered boon by the people. After the anxiety about obtaining children to teach had thus passed away, it was natural that attention should be more directly given to the perfecting of the system of instruction; and for this, concentration was seen to be essential. The attendance and diligence of the children can be adequately stimulated only by the presence and notice of the Superintendent. It is here, and her encouragement, that is the mainspring of the school. The Native teachers are in most cases too indolent and unfaithful to do any thing effective, except when under the eye of a superior. But the superior can be only in one school at a time, and only for a short portion of the school-hours of five or three schools, in a day; and she has to expend much time and strength in merely passing from school to school. Hence with great labour, little after all is gained. Grieved by her experience of this kind, Mrs. Wilson determined on having her Central School, where she might have the children of many schools assembled together at her own home; and her point was gained. Yet the Central School affords but a collection of heathen children, amongst whom the pious solicitude of the Superintendent for the religious instruction, her, charge, or even of the most promising individuals, is huffed and disappointed by the unavoidable restraints and contaminating associations of caste and idolatry. This evil is felt peculiarly when a portion of the children, being the offspring of Christian converts, or themselves through the instruction of the school weaned from idolatry, and enabled to attach themselves as disciples to their Christian teachers, are prepared for Christian culture of the most decided character. Then a home is earnestly desired in which this highest species of education may be pursued without hindrance: and hence has arisen the institution of Christian Boarding Schools, or Orphan Asylums.

It is a cheering fact that Native Female education has taken such a course. It shows in those who have had the conduct of it, a noble and resolute endeavour after high things. There has not been a hiring task, to be got through in any way; but a generous enterprise for doing the greatest possible good. Nevertheless we are persuaded that, in one sense, they must go black again. We do not mean that the Refuge and Boarding Schools should be dismissed or neglected. On the contrary, every pains should be taken to perfect them. They are, perhaps without exception, the most beautiful things in the country; and there are few more beneficial. The Central Schools are also invaluable, and indeed indispensable: but we are convinced we must leave the common schools again. They must be at last the broad basis on which the system of the Central Schools and Boarding Schools can alone stand with security. We may not yet have the means of reviving the small schools to advantage: but the means should be sought; and the Central Schools and the Christian Boarding Schools should be employed in producing that part of them which belongs to effective agency.

When this work began, the object that was sought was the elevation of the female sex in India, by imparting knowledge to them. It had, therefore, a great and extensive aim: and it will not do now to say, we cannot grasp so great a matter—we must confine ourselves to our own people, or those who will follow our own faith. We are heartily glad that Mrs. Chapman keeps to the old argument. Her readers have before them the state of Indian women, and the misery of all kinds it entails upon the whole people. That, therefore, is what she would deal with; and every true philanthropist will take the same view. To do this, however, we must take care not to withdraw fastidiously from the very people we wish to benefit. If we do, there are no others to undertake what we neglect. The whole womankind of India must remain degraded as they are, unless we give ourselves to their deliverance. Mrs. Chapman says very justly, "with reference to female education, it is impossible for Government to interfere; neither can the means for improving the condition of the female population become the subject of legislation." She is equally correct in the conviction, that nothing is to be hoped from the Natives themselves, at least for a long time to come. Native female education must be carried by Christian zeal to such a point, that it shall become a desideratum with the people themselves; and then they will see to the means of its extension. But, for this purpose, schools must be multiplied: education must be brought to the doors of the poor: and our high seminaries must be fed, and the demand for them indefinitely increased, from the supply of candidates for the best sort of education which the inferior schools shall yield. Let it be remembered, female education is only beginning. In our best schools we are only as yet experimenting. All the work has still to be undertaken. Only we are far better prepared for it, than we were sixteen or eighteen years ago. We hope Mrs. Chapman's interesting volume will serve the purpose of enforcing such ideas both here and at home. Our readers will find it worthy of their perusal.

THE IDOLATRY QUESTION AND THE HUKKARU.—Our Contemporary has, during the past week, again advanced the propriety of supporting the idolatry of this country, by the resources and influence of the State. As we have invariably combated the propriety of perpetuating Native superstition by public patronage, we cannot allow his arguments to pass, without a remark or two. Our Contemporary appears to have taken up rather higher ground on the present occasion, and,—if we rightly understand the argument,—to advocate the public support of idolatry, on the plea that it is the natural and necessary consequence of our position in this land. "The most that we do, is to let the idolaters have a little of their own money back again, to worship their own gods; and yet the people who declaim against this work of restitution, have not a word to say against the original spoliation. Their conscience pricks them not when taking, but when restoring. By murder and spoliation have we Christian men attained to our present position among an idolatrous people; and yet we think nothing of the murder and spoliation by means of which we have become governors of this idolatrous empire; but are much scandalized at the idea of not governing these idolaters according to Christian doctrines." As to the murder and spoliation by which we are said to have attained this empire, it is possible that the Editor may have had in view the wanton murder in the Black Hole, and the plunder of Calcutta by Seraj-ood-Dowlah, which was exactly the murder and spoliation, in consequence of which we obtained this empire. If, however, our Contemporary should have his eye on the successive augmentation of our dominions, we refer him to the page of history for these two facts; that never has there been an instance in which an empire was forced on the conquerors so unequivocally as the Empire of India was forced on us; and never was any empire of such magnitude acquired since the flood, with less of murder or spoliation. Our empire has enlarged its limits in spite of Acts of Parliament; in spite of the Court of Directors; in spite of ourselves. It has grown out of the irresistible necessity of self defence; not from the volitional impulse of ambition. But this is a historical question; and we have to do with a religious one. Allowing that the empire has been acquired by murder and spoliation, the best, the only atonement which, in our humble opinion, we can make to the people, is to give them the blessings of a Government based on Christian doctrines and principles. We put it to our Contemporary, whether it would not be an aggravation of the original wrong, to govern this country upon the doctrines of the Hindoo, or even the Mahomedan religion. Whether it would not be a still farther aggravation, if we were to abandon the country altogether, and to leave the Hindoos to govern themselves, upon the principles and doctrines of their own Shastras, and thus to deprive the people of that small mitigation of the mischief of those doctrines, which might be expected, if they were to be carried into practice,—were that possible,—under Christian auspices. Justly or unjustly here we are, and our position entails obligations; and our obligations to the people cannot be fulfilled, but by giving them the best principles of government within our reach; and those principles,—the Hukkaru himself being judge,—are to be found in the Bible, and not in the Vedas or the Koran.

When our Contemporary talks of the support of Idolatry by the present Government, as merely a restitution—as simply letting the idolaters have a little of their own money back again to worship their own gods, we are strongly reminded of David Hume's defence of suicide: Where is the harm of turning a few ounces of blood in a contrary direction? Our Contemporary can scarcely be in earnest in pursuing this line of argument. Restitution always carries with it the sacredness of an obligation. The obligation in this case would be nothing, more or less, than that Government should support the superstitions of the heathen, by the resources and the influence of the State. Can such an obligation grow out of the circumstance of our collecting the public revenues, for the general government of the country? We throw out of account the circumstance that this is a Christian Government; our Contemporary will not admit this position. Supposing, then, the Government to be as Unchristian as the Hakura can desire, still it is a civilized and enlightened Government. And is it to be supposed, that because it takes revenue for the general administration of the country, it is, thereby bound to dispend a part of those revenues in perpetuating a system of religion, which has cast this land into the depths of moral degradation? If this be the case, who is to decide the extent of our idolatrous obligations? The idolaters themselves, to be sure; and whatever they may determine to be the share which naturally falls to the gods, and shrines, and brahmins, of the public revenues, we shall be bound to relinquish to them, upon the principle of restitution. Upon this ground, moreover, we should be constrained for ever to uphold this degrading superstition. We read the obligations of this Unchristian, but still civilized and enlightened Government, in a different mode. We hold, that while the Natives receive full and free toleration, in all their religious rites, it cannot but be as much the desire of the British Government, as we are sure it is of the Editor of the Hakura, that the country should be delivered from the thralldom of this degrading creed, which keeps its victims in such a state of unnatural depression. It cannot, therefore, be the duty of Government, under any delusive notion of restitution, to throw the whole of its weight into the scale of Idolatry, and to give it as much perpetuity as the resources and influence of the State can bestow. It cannot be the duty of the public authorities to devote funds raised for the good government of the country, to objects which must perpetuate the national delusion. There can be no moral obligation to so immoral a line of conduct. Neither is there any political obligation. We made no stipulations with the Hindus, when we conquered their country from the Mahomedans, that we would pension their gods, and shrines, and priests, from the public revenues. Our connection with their idols arose at a subsequent period, partly from the sordid view of dividing the unholy gains of superstition with the priests, partly from the still more objectionable desire to prop up the system. It was our Christian functionaries, who had left both their consciences and their religion at the Cape, and who mourned over the decay of idolatrous worship, and the desertion of the temples, who induced Government to undertake the patronage of Idolatry. Our connection with the temples was part and parcel of that illiberal system which every true friend to India must rejoice to see exploded by the more enlightened views of this age. The support of Idolatry is the only remaining vestige of those odious and degrading notions which prevailed half a century ago; and the sooner it follows its brethren to the grave, the better.

After these remarks had been written, we received, through our own London papers, a copy of Sir Peregrine Maitland's letter, relative to the support of Idolatry by the British Government, and would ask the reader's particular attention to it. It places the subject in the clearest point of view, and it advocates principles of the most enlightened toleration. It is a document which reflects equal honour on Sir Peregrine's head and heart. A perusal of it is calculated to convince the most fastidious, that he has acted on the highest principles both of equity, honour and religion.

THE COLONY OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—The following remarks on this interesting Colony, though unavoidably postponed to the present time, will not appear out of place to any one who reflects on the permanent interest of the subject. It is now scarcely three years since we had occasion to bring before the reader those new principles of colonization, upon which it was proposed to people South Australia, and which might be considered as introducing a new and important era in the history of man. The Colony of New South Wales, originally founded as a penal settlement, after England had lost the opportunity of emptying her jails into America, was fated to lie under all the disadvantages inseparable from a state of things in which the majority of the population consisted of convicts, or their immediate descendants. And it was found that many years must elapse before the accession of free settlers, combined with the cessation of convict importations, could impart a high moral tone to the Colony, or counteract the vices of its original constitution. The Colony of Swan River was formed upon principles equally erroneous, though not, in a moral point of view, equally fatal. This Colony was crippled in its cradle, by the absurd system of giving away large grants of land, free of cost. The consequence was, that in some instances, a favoured individual obtained land several miles in length, which he had no means of adequately settling; the next grant was made beyond his principality; and as a necessary consequence, the settlers were placed at an inconvenient distance from each other, and from any common mart which might be erected for the disposal of their produce; and the Colony presented the appearance of patches of cultivation at long intervals, with intervening deserts.

The Colony of South Australia was projected on a totally new principle, so simple in its nature, so efficient in practice, possessing so essentially the elements of vitality, as to challenge our highest admiration. It was "that all the land should be sold, and the proceeds employed in sending out labouring families from England to till it." Thus, instead of penal labourers tainting the morals of the settlement, Australia will possess a healthy, vigorous, and comparatively moral peasantry. Instead of vast tracts of territory owned by one man, and left in a state of nature, the over acquisition of land is checked by the necessity of paying for it; and there is the strongest prompt, that whatever is paid for, will be cultivated. These principles were wrought into the constitution of the new Colony, and received the approbation of the Home Legislature. A Bill was brought in, and passed, for constituting South Australia a separate Colony; and a scene of colonizing enterprise was immediately presented to view, to which there has been nothing comparable since the days when Greece colonized the opposite coast of Asia Minor. The tide of emigration set in vigorously, and in a little more than two years, nine thousand settlers proceeded to the new Colony. The city of Adelaide was laid out, as the metropolis of the new kingdom, upon a plan eminently calculated to secure health and comfort to its inhabitants; and so amazingly has the value of land risen there, that a single acre of ground has been sold for 1,500£ and even 2,000£. Those institutions which, in other Colonies, have been the growth of a series of years, have sprung up in this infant settlement, as if by the wand of a magician. An Adelaide Directory now before us, contains a list of establishments, such as we could not expect to find, but in some old and long established country. Scilicet has so vigorous a spirit of enterprise been exhibited to the eyes of mankind; and there is little chance of its dying out. The salubrity of the climate, and the fertility of the soil, firm attractions of permanent value, while the large sums which continue to be paid for land, will enable the Commissioners to send forth hundreds and thousands of industrious labourers, who cannot fail to give a steady character of progressive enlargement to the Colony. We find, to our astonishment, that the number of vessels which entered the Port in 1838, did not fall short of one hundred and one; and this number will increase, as the land is turned into cultivated fields, and the Colony begins to export its own produce. Meanwhile the prospect is opened to the new settlers of a communication with England, in a little more than two months, through the new Steam Navigation Company, which has been formed in London, for connecting the new with the old world, by a line of magnificent packets which will proceed as far as the Isthmus of Panama; thereby enabling the inhabitants of New Holland, by means at first of sailing vessels, but at no distant period of steam ships, to avail themselves of this line of communication on the Western side of the Isthmus. Facilities will soon be created for crossing this tongue of land, so as to give an unbroken line of navigation from Adelaide and Sydney to London, without encountering the desolations of Cape Horn; and this circumstance cannot fail to bring so vast an accession of colonists, that the rapid settlement of America, viewed by Burke with such feelings of exultation and surprise, will be cast altogether into the shade by the still more rapid growth of New Holland, from a Colony to an Empire.

We cannot pursue the subject farther at present, but shall return to it next week, and lay before our readers the interesting information gleaned from the two journals already established at Adelaide.

POLICE REFORM.—BUNDLEKUND.—A Correspondent, well acquainted with the reformed Police in Jalown, and with the old Police in British Bundelkund, has sent us a valuable communication, which will be found in its appropriate column. He confirms, from personal experience, the report sent us by "the Reform," of the beneficial effects which have resulted from the new system; and at the same time draws up a plan for extending it gradually into our own provinces. We commend it to the careful attention of those on whom the responsibilities of our administration rest. The plan which has been adopted in Jalown, is obviously so wise, and so admirably adapted to ensure justice to the people, that it scarcely needed the corroborative testimony of our Correspondent. It is a happy circumstance that such a plan has already been put to the test of experience, and that those who advocate the multiplication of European Officers, as the first and most efficient step in Police reform, are enabled to point to one province in which the experiment has been tried, and has succeeded. It remains now to make an attempt to ascertain how far it is likely to succeed in our own provinces, in curing those grievances under which the people groan. Security of life and property, both from external and internal aggression, is the first duty, as it is the most unequivocal test of a good Government. We have succeeded, without question, in defending this country from external invasion; but in the other branch of duty we have as signally failed. So far from having conferred the blessing of domestic peace and security on our subjects, we have managed to give them a system of Police, than which none was ever better adapted to deprive them of it. The Natives whom we have appointed as guardians of the public interests, have become monsters of oppression; and the unhappy people have thus been placed between two fires; the one kindled by thieves and robbers; the other, by the Government itself. It is time that both should be extinguished; and there is this high encouragement associ-ed with any plan of efficient reform in the Police, that it will destroy both plagues by the same effort. The great increase of crime in this country, is to be traced to the unwillingness of the people to complain, because our officers of Police are generally the greater plague of the two. When the flogs of the Darogah have been extracted, and the people are thereby encouraged to come forward and aid the Police, the number of robbers will naturally decrease, and the long lost blessings of security and happiness be restored to the people.

We would, therefore, repeat the entreaty, that the Jalown system of Police may have a fair trial here; that European Magistrates, with salaries of 3, 4 or 500 Rupees a month may be placed in a circle, of which the extreme limits shall not be more than ten or twelve miles from the centre. A hundred benefits would flow from the establishment of intelligent and honest European agents upon such a plan, independently of the improvement of the Police. We know at present next to nothing of the country we have been governing for the last eighty years, and more; but if this system were once adopted, that reproach would soon be wiped out. The European Assistant Magistrate would soon make himself acquainted with whatever it was important to know, respecting his small jurisdiction. From the information quickly and imperceptibly gained by him in his perpetual travels through it, we would soon have a register of every village, the number of its inhabitants, their character, sect and occupation. We should ascertain the particular manufactures which may predominate in them, the current of barter and traffic, and the real condition of the people. We should be able to ascertain the number of schools and scholars, and the state of intellectual culture or ignorance, without which no extensive system of education can be framed. We should know the character of the landlords, and the condition of the tenantry. If an able Native surveyor were attached to each jurisdiction for a time, we should have accurate and detailed maps of each section of the country, which would not fail to be highly useful, as it regards the construction of roads, bridges and canals. We should, in short, for the first time, enjoy the prospect of acquiring that statistical knowledge of the country and its inhabitants, which shall put us in a position to confer real benefits upon them. Aye! all this information, so invaluable in itself, and in its results, would be acquired, not only without alarming the people, but with their entire concurrence; because it would be associated with relief from the intolerable evils which our Police at present inflicts on them.

PERSIA AND AFGHANISTAN.—The information received by the last Mail, respecting the progress of events in connection with Persia, is calculated to confirm the propriety of our military expedition beyond the Indus. The French Government has determined to send a political mission, on a magnificent scale, to the Persian Court, on the ground that it is now become the centre of movements in the East, in which France ought to participate. It is well known that the only movement in Persia, of any political consequence, is that which has reference to our empire in the East. The Court of Persia has been, for the past two or three years, the scene of intrigues for advancing a hostile European interest to the borders of our Asiatic dominions. It was there that the plan was formed for a march into Hindustan, of which the siege of Herat was the first step. And it must appear singular and anomalous, that an British Resident should be present in that Court, at the time when our European power, and that our nearest Asiatic neighbour, is in full possession of the ear of the sovereign; and another power, and that our nearest European neighbour, is preparing to mingle in the political arrangements which may be there concerted. If, in these circumstances, Afghanistan had been still open to European and Persian intrigue, and closed, as it was recently, against any countervailing influence on our part, we might well have felt anxious for the security of our possessions in India. But with the predominant influence which we have now established from Herat to the Indus, with the intervening country completely within the range, and under the observation of our functionaries, we may look with comparative security on the progress of European diplomacy at the Court of Teheran. The march to Cabul appears now to have been a measure indispensably necessary to the security of the British Empire in the East; and it is amply justified, as much by the circumstances which have since transpired, as by those which preceded it. There can be little doubt, that if General Allard had been in command beyond the Indus, at a time when a French Minister was residing, with unusual pomp, at the Court of Persia, the political relations in Afghanistan, under the government of Dost Mahomed, would have become inconceivably complicated, and our frontiers would have been exposed to the perpetual risk of disturbances. The occupation of Afghanistan, by a Prince friendly to us, and the establishment of our authority throughout his dominions, has served to neutralize whatever evils may be expected arise from intrigues in Persia.

REPORT ON BOOTAN, BY CAPTAIN R. B. PEMBERTON.—Third Notice.—THE POLITICAL RELATIONS OF BOOTAN.—We return to the affairs of Bootan with the greater willingness, because, within the last few days, rumours have reached us of proceedings, on the part of Nepal, toward Bootan, which give the political relations of that country an immediate interest and importance, very different from what would belong, in ordinary circumstances, to a mere section of political geography, such as the Report of Captain Pemberton presents to our notice. We shall begin with a summary of his information.

The most intimate relations of Bootan are those which connect it with Tibet and China. We have before stated, that after the Chinese, in 1791, had humbled the Goorkhas or Nepaless, in defence of Tibet and Bootan, they openly assumed the sovereignty of Tibet. Since that time, therefore, Tibet has been distinctly a province of the Celestial Empire, occupied by its troops, and having its affairs administered by its officers. But Bootan was not rich enough to be worth the governing and occupying. The Chinese have, therefore, been content to hold it as a tributary state, in whose affairs they claim the right of interfering on occasion, as the paramount authority. The only regular communication between the superior and inferior state is thus described by Captain Pemberton. Once a year, messengers come from Lassa, bearing an imperial mandate from China, addressed to the Deb and Dhurma Rajas of Bootan, and the Pilos and Zompons under their orders. It is written on fine cambric, in large characters, and generally contains instructions to be careful in the government of the country, to quell promptly all internal tumult or rebellion, and to report immediately, on pain of the infliction of a heavy fine, any apprehended invasion from external foes. With this mandate twenty-one gold pieces of coin are sent, as a mark of respect, it is supposed, to the Dhurma Raja. A reply is dispatched by special messengers, who are always attended by twenty-three coolies bearing loads of a particularly fine rice, grown in Assam; and other goods are also sent to the amount of 3,000 Rupees, consisting chiefly of silks and cottons, also from Assam. For these, a return present is received of Chinese flowered silks and scarfs, coral, and moulds of gold and silver. Presents likewise pass between the Dhurma Raja of Bootan and the Dalai Lama of Lassa; and three Lamas, on the part of Bootan, are constantly in attendance at Lassa, which is venerated by the Bootees generally, as Rome by the Roman Catholics. Although the Chiefs of Bootan are engaged in constant feuds, all parties are equally averse to any interference in their cause by the authorities of Tibet or China, and, therefore, all appeal to them is avoided. It is said that on one occasion, neglect of the instructions in the annual edict, brought down on Bootan the infliction of a fine of 10,000 Deba Rupees, which the country was too poor to pay, except by three annual instalments. Nothing could be more unwelcome than a reputation of such discipline.

Immediately to the west of Bootan is the little territory of the Sikkim Raja, who is said by Gutzlaff to send a small annual tribute to the Dalai Lama at Lassa, and to receive a trifling present in return. The Bootees, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Sikkim country, carry on a little traffic with its people: but beside this, there appears to be no communication between the two countries. Sikkim, however, is of the last importance to Bootan, as its barrier against the Nepaless; to which restless and aspiring people the subjugation of Bootan has long been an object ardently desired.

Indeed we have just heard, that the Court of Nepal has actually demanded from our Government a passage through Sikkim for its troops, for the conquest of Bootan. If this be so, the demand or request is about the most impudent thing on record: for Nepal can have no ground of complaint against Bootan; and all her conduct, for two years past, towards our Government, has been as faithless and hostile as it could be. Even if her conduct to the British Government had been blameless, we could not, in justice, be necessary to her wanton aggression on Bootan, nor in policy permit her to escape out of those limits which were prescribed to her by the Treaty of Segowly. But in actual circumstances it would be nothing but madness on our part to listen to such a request, as it is unbounded insolence on that of Nepal to have made it. Her machinations and her attitude, during the recent season of general political excitement, have, we believe, been closely and severely scanned; and the opinion of the expediency and necessity of crippling effectually so ill disposed a neighbour is gaining strength every day, both in England and in India. For some time past it has been necessary to keep a cautionary force opposite to Nepal; and as this necessity is both expensive and troublesome, it is likely soon to establish the conviction, that, rather than be forced to such expedients, in seasons of trouble, we should at once extract the fangs and talons of our treacherous ally. There is sufficient evidence, we suspect, forthcoming, to prove that for some time past, Nepal has been indefatigable in her endeavours to excite combination against our Government, amongst all its allies and neighbours, internal and external, from Peking to Herat; as well as to stir up our more influential subjects to insurrection and tumult. That these proceedings have not yet been peremptorily called in question, is no proof that they will not soon be so: and as nearly all our enemies, at home and abroad, have now been disposed of, it is not likely that Nepal, the secret instigator or confederate of so many of them, will much longer be suffered to harass and vex us with impunity.

A fine thing truly it would be to suffer the Nepaul Raja to seize upon Bootan. If he kept it, great would be his satisfaction in being able afterwards to take Assam on the flank, with his friend Tharawaddoe to assist it on the other. Or if, as before, the Chinese came to the rescue of their tributaries, and drove back the Nepaless to their own territo-lence of the Chinese, will make their instructions altogether inapplicable. The Consulate from Bombay, which conveyed the mails of the Water Witch, was twenty-five days in getting from Aden to Jaula!

— Two sales of fancy work took place in Calcutta this day; the one, for the encouragement of industry among the indigenous families of Calcutta; the other, for Mrs. Wilson's School at Agartara. It was an unfortunate circumstance, totally accidental, we believe, that they should have been held on the same day. The sale for the benefit of industrious females, consisting entirely of their own work, could not, of course, offer any comparison with the splendid shew of articles sent out from England for the Refuge; and it suffered from the comparison.

— More particular accounts from China, exculpate Capt. Elliot from the charge of cowardice, in not having followed up the attack on the Fora and the Junks, at Hong Kong. The Chinese abandoned both during the night; which was the best of all reasons for not attacking them.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16.

— Sir Willoughby Cotton, with the Cavalry, left Calcutta on the 16th, on his return to the British provinces. He will, in all probability, assume the Division command at Meerut. The troops remaining in Afghanistan will be commanded by General Nott, the Senior Officer; under whom, Brigadier Sale will act. The troops now on their return, will march direct through the Punjab. We suppose, therefore, that the rumours of a determination, on the part of the dominant party at Lahore, to refuse a passage, must be altogether unfounded; more especially as such a refusal, after permission had been once conceded, would necessarily lead to a collision.

— The latest accounts from the Punjab give a deplorable account of the state of degradation to which the actual Rajah, Kurruck Sing, has been reduced: by his son, the Commander-in-Chief, &c. the troops, at the instigation of the two powerful and ambitious Premier, Dheera Sing. They had led the King to Unrishter to celebrate the Dussehra, where in sullen silence he spoke to no one, and was noticed by few. How soon falls the loss of the great founder of Sikh greatness been felt. The treasurer, a faithful servant of old Runjeet, has been loaded with fetters; a presage of the fate which awaits other Chiefs.

— The papers notice the manufacture, to a very considerable extent, of a superior kind of gunny bag, by the prisoners at the Allipore, or the metropolitan jail. How much wiser a plan would it be, to construct roads by contract, when they would be done cheaper, better and sooner, and to employ the prisoners on severe in-door tasks, so as to make them invariably pay the expenses of their own maintenance.— The gallant 61st has just sailed to England from Ceylon.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 18.

— Intelligence has been received from Moumein to the 30th of October. News had arrived there of a late date from Rangoon. Every appearance in the Burmese empire indicated peace and tranquillity. Tharrawadee, so far from contemplating a war with us, had, it is said, laid aside every hostile intention. The Usurper was building a new palace, but it was upset by an earthquake; this was considered as a disapproval of his views by the Powers Above, and it was supposed the same disapproval would follow a declaration of war with the English. Peace secured by an earthquake!

— All Mauritius is in an uproar; and the authorities have been taking especial pains to manifest their unfitness for the task of government. Two French vessels of war at Port Louis, in hanging out their flags to dry, accidentally placed the French Ensign above the English. Capt. Driver, of the Citadelle, to resent this supposed insult, the next morning suspended the tri-coloured flag of France from under the bow of his ship. This premeditated insult produced a remonstrance to the Governor, and the Captain was ordered not only to take away the flag, but to make an apology to the French Officers, which was done. Here the matter ought to have rested; but the sapient Governor demanded reparation from the French, and insisted that the British Union Flag should be hoisted at the foremost head of the French ships. The French Officers gave a written declaration, that there was no intention, whatever to offer any insult to the British Flag, by the mode in which the different colours had been hoisted on the French ships, but peremptorily refused to hoist the British Union Flag. On this, batteries were erected on both sides the Corvettes, cannon pointed to them, the troops placed under arms, and the steamer held in readiness to take two hundred troops of the line to the vessels. But His Excellency's ardour cooled, and all this gaseousness ended in ordering all intercourse between the French ships of war and the shore to cease. The vessels soon after left the port and sailed to Bourbon. It is to be hoped that Lord John Russell will not fail to send a sound wadding to the foolish Governor.

— Some wags at Barrackpore have revenged themselves on the unpopular commander of the 3rd N. L., by announcing his marriage with a Widow at that station, which never took place.

— Messrs. Eglington, of Calcutta, and <sup>and</sup> ~~and~~ of Madras, were too late for the steamer which last left Bombay.

— The order of the Directors in Leadenhall Street, for the immediate constitution of the Bombay Bank, contrary to the principles advocated in the despatch from Calcutta, do not appear as yet to have reached Bombay. After being announced two months ago as having arrived, all that we now hear is, that references and discussions are now pending with the authorities.

— Fresh discoveries of cannon, and balls, and mortars, (two of which are of unusual size and magnificence), continue to be made at Kurmool, and it is said that the property found there, including military stores and money, is nearer two crores of Rupees than one.

— A most aggravated case of child stealing has been discovered at Madras.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 19.

The papers are entirely barren.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20.

— The Hon. the Deputy Governor, with Mr. H. M. Parker, and Captain Rutherford, have returned from their sojourn on the Enterprise. His Honor visited Akyah, to the small surprise of the European functionaries there.

— The Englishman of this morning announces, that Shah Kamran, of Herat, has not only disavowed all the European officers sent to him, but has written to Shah Soojah to say, that unless he also sends away all the Europeans and European troops around him, he, Kamran, will form an alliance with the Kings of Bokhara and Persia, and the chiefs of Khoolum and Khoondouz, and drive Shah Soojah into Hindoostan. This intelligence, so directly the reverse of all the previous notices had led us to expect, requires confirmation.

— A meeting of the Landholder's Society, was held on Wednesday, the 18th instant, when the subject of the proposed Act was brought up, regarding sales of land, and it was determined, that a memorial be drawn up with suggestions for the amendment of the Act; and that the memorial be published at once, in order to ascertain public opinion on the various points discussed therein. Thus through the culpable neglect of Government, it appears that the Act has been withheld from the knowledge of the people, while the memorial pointing out its errors, is to be disseminated throughout the country.

— Letters from Rangoon to the 23d of October, state that every thing was tranquil, trade flourishing, and at a sumptuous dinner given to the European merchants by the Burmese Collector of Customs, the health of his Burmese Majesty, Tharrawadee was drunk, and then that of Her Britannic Majesty.

— Major Napier Campbell, of the Artillery, died at sea on the 20th October, on the Hero of Malacca.

LANDHOLDER'S SOCIETY.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—About four years ago, I quoted to the Barkara, the following words: "Representes le peuple pour qu'il ne represente letrus memes;" and here we have the Zemindary Association representing a most important class of our Indian subjects.

The Government might then have initiated the organization of a representative system, on principles which might have seemed to it most advisable; but now it cannot. There the Association is not a shadow, but a substance, and one composed of elements elements, instead of such as the Government might have introduced. When will we abandon the "let alone" system of constitutional policy? When come to regard all past history as a mere blank, or merely as a school exercise?

The present objects of the above Association seem to me most legitimate and laudable, and so were the original objects of the Jacobin club, and the more virtuous and noble club of the Girondists; but both outran their original objects.

My humble objection to the Zemindary Association is, that its constitution is that of a club. This is an institution which cannot come into collision with other general interests. In an Association for social, scientific or such other purposes, it is very well; but in an association which must have many interests at variance with those it does not include, it seems to me, that the self-elected constitution is objectionable; that it will act too much on itself; its spirit will become the essence of all that is bad, or convertible to bad, in its first elements, from which all external influence is, by the system of election, precluded.

"But the Zemindar club is a respectable body." Now of all public bodies, I object most to those which are called "respectable," because the term betrays that they are not responsible; and in all such bodies the corporate sense will, more or less, destroy the moral sense. The medium of selfishness which (at least) there is in every individual, is multiplied by the number of members, and the aggregate is the spirit of the respectable public body. In regard to shame and conscience, we must divide, instead of multiplying, as above. The most respectable public body now in England, is the most tenuous of patronage, and is the most complete jobocracy: I name it now.

Even in its best and purest intentions, a self-elected club becomes too opinionated, narrow and intense. If, as it were, "by passing on itself, grows blind" to the views of others—it will admit none but co-partisans, when the terms of election become (to prevent excess of numbers,) more stringent; and thus there will be an augmentation, without a dilution of the spirit.

But, after all, let us make the best of this new creation; let us call him up and see him; for, like Danton's giant-head, exhibited at the Guillotine, he is worth looking at, both with the eye of the body, and the eye of the mind. Bring him up stairs. Let him stand there. Does it talk? Perhaps he is too modest, and must be encouraged first. "How are you, on an average, eh? You have grown very much since I last saw you. Are you still as modest as then?" (The creature answers, "Yes; modesty is my only fault.") "Ah, a good sign; my grandmother used to say it was a sure sign of merit." "Can I do any thing for you?" (The creature answers modestly, "All I venture to wish is, to ride on your shoulders;" "and then I shall be in what Bonaparte used to call an original position." "You insolent scoundrel, godown stairs immediately." (The creature answers modestly, as before, "I won't." "You won't go." "I'll set the Sudder Adawlut at you." "A fig for the Sudder or Smother Adawlut." "I'll set the Board of Revenue at you." The creature, "By the bye, I wish you would do away with the Board of Revenue." "A board's a seven," as Jeremy Bentham says; "we can do every thing for you; we will be the Board, and will do justice to all, except the ryots." "Oh! is there any thing else you ask?" The creature, "Not now." You insolent—"call the sentries—their good conduct at least is secured by higher pay and pensions," here turn this creature out." (Enter soldiers, and without asking permission, take hold of the creature's nose and conduct him to the door, vociferating in nasal accents, this is unconstitutional. "I give you warning I'll, I'll protest, and send my protest to the Editors of the Huruk and the Chandrika. I'll send home another barrier. I'll send home Mr. T. and Mr. D., who has a good face for a grievance, accompanied by a brother of Mr. K. whose son was pensioned, because his father tried to extinguish the Chairman of the Directors. I'll complain—I'll complain to Peter Gordon and Lord Brougham." "Despotism—a hundred millions of people—clap trap. Smother Adawlut—judicial cattle and tent dealing—winked at—Mr. Poynder's an ass—idolatry—magna charta, &c."

* The representative perage of Scotland is the Toryism of all the Scottish Press, debilitated to an essence.

† The idea of a "respectable body" never attaches to the House of Commons.

And now that we have extended this creature for a time, what shall we do next to prevent such scenes, and to prevent its growing like a young cuckoo in a sparrow's nest, beyond all compass, overshadowing or excluding all similar claims to its own from the parent? What, also, shall we, in sober earnest do, to prevent this new accession of that undue centralization which already renders the State too unwieldy to be managed?

My humble idea is, that we must get up a counter-action. Let us do all we can to balance this new creation, by creating a corresponding strength among those who are now threatened by the engrossing power of this new phenomenon. We cannot get up a society of ryots, renters, artificers and provincial traders to urge this it claims equally with the Zemindary Society: but let us give official power and authority to all classes; let us initiate elective organization in the provincial municipalities; let us thus excite, fertilize and invigorate the social seed-field with new motives to improvement, new activities; and diffuse over the whole field the all-pervading, all-penetrating, and all-vivifying light of primary education; and not with the supererogatory lightening of transcendental education. Let us thus stimulate the whole soil; and instead of stunted productions, such as are threatened by the overshadowing of this now loftier wonder of the forest, a new and vigorous growth will be excited, able to command an equal share in the benefits of the soil, which the roots of its new and portentous growth might engross, and able to rise to an equal share of the common light which its overshadowing branches threaten to intercept.

In the above, there is no intention to blame the Society for not having included the lower agricultural interests in their scheme of representation. Indeed, their doing so, might be very dangerous; for instead of their stimulating the lower classes were stimulating them, and yet the phrase is—letting to go ahead, and (what is worse,) doing so; and though I have ventured to object to their constitution, it is difficult to say how, under the circumstances, they could have done better. A representative system, without a representative body, might possibly, have been established; that is, a system of written representation from the various provinces, which might be safer than, and as efficacious as, representative meetings in the dense and explosive atmosphere of the capital; but there the thing is—a of in mere gristle, but in flesh, and bone, and strength; and I have only given, as my peppercorn of suggestion, that we should create a countervailing power among those whose interests are now at all likely to be postponed, to the more systematically and strenuously urged interests of the Landholder's Society.

Yours,
GASSANDRA.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—With no small interest have I perused the letter of "Reform" in your paper of the 7th instant, together with the judicious and excellent Editorial remarks from yourself, which it was the means of eliciting. Having had the opportunity of travelling over, on several successive occasions, the whole of British Bunderland, as well as the Native Contiguous States, I can, without hesitation, affirm, that what you have stated is, in substance, correct. When passing through the Jalore State last year, I had an opportunity of hearing from the Natives how highly pleased they were with the new system of Police, as administered by Messrs. Dyce, Cairn and Pasannah, the three Assistant Sub-perintendents of Jalore, Orai and Mahobah. The latter officer conducted his Kutehary duties at three different villages weekly, remaining two days at each, viz., Kobral, Mahobah and Srenauzeer. All within 12 miles of each other; thus bringing justice to the very doors of the poor villagers. In the Jalore State it is so far fortunate, that the Foris in the principal villages generally contain one or two rooms which can be fitted up, in something like comfort, for an European Officer: this is an advantage which could not be possessed in the Upper, and many parts of the Upper Provinces. * Mr. Simon Fraser deserves great credit for maturing the system under review; but to make it more perfect, a stimulus ought to be held out to Assistants to succeed, in time, to the higher grade of Superintendent. The present, Lieut. Dalan, I believe, draws the large allowance of 2,000 Rupees per mensem, quite out of proportion to his subordinates, who only receive 800 Rupees; and when it is considered those gentlemen have to reside almost in exile, and to move about occasionally, the salary must be considered too small.

If, instead of this, the next Superintendent was to get 1000 Rupees, and the Assistant Superintendents each 500 per annum, with the hope of promotion, as opportunity offered, I think it would not be more than just.

The famines of 1832 and 1837 were severely felt in the Jalown territories; and the population has been greatly reduced thereby; but, independent of this drain, numbers of Ryots absconded from the oppression of the Zemindars, who exacted whatever they thought fit from the cultivators; but when the rents of the State were demanded of the Landholders, they shut themselves up in their fortified villages, and set the ruling powers at defiance. This has now all ceased; and many of the old inhabitants are locating themselves in their former homes. The character of the soil corresponds much with that of British Bundelkand.

In the Mahabab district, the scenery is romantically beautiful and picturesque, interspersed with lovely and extensive lakes of crystal water, surrounded by granite hills, varying in height from 100 to 250 feet.

The newly acquired Jhansi estate has, I fancy, been put on the same footing as Jalown. And the Governor General's Agent will now possess but little time for the duties of his Judgeship.

On a careful consultation of a correct map of the country, in which the boundaries are clearly laid down, it must be observable how strikingly different the facilities of obtaining justice in the adjoining Elaks of Jalown and British Bundelkand must be.

Northern Bundelkand is far more extensive than the Jalown territory, and the boundaries more spreading, owing to the Jelpore and Chhysabte Rajah's estates. The Sudder Station of this Zillah is Humeerpore, and its relative distance from the boundary of the district may be taken thus:

North,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles; South, 60 miles; East, 13 miles; West, 70 miles.

At this Station the worthy Collector and Magistrate, till lately, had to conduct the duties of the whole district. A slight alteration has been made within the last twelve months, and the Joint Collector and Magistrate has been removed to Calpee. This, again, is only 20 miles west from Humeerpore; and being on the banks of the Jumna, is hardly more central; the measure, therefore, is only so far of use as regards the town of Calpee.

Bandah is the Sudder Station of the Southern Division, and its relative distance from the boundaries of the district may be calculated as follows:

North, 80 miles; South, 40 miles; East, 90 miles; West, 15 miles.

Thus the poor people at the most distant point from the Sudder have to traverse 80 or 90 miles; and, consequently, the Native Officers can exercise all but arbitrary power. Another evil is, the Collector and Magistrate has so much duty at the Sudder Station, including the charge of Treasury, that he is unable to take a general tour of his district once a year. Five full months, say from November to the end of March, would hardly suffice to visit every portion; whereas, if this Officer does go out at all, he is obliged to hover about the Sudder, to enable him personally to inspect the Treasury balance, once or twice every a month. The more distant, and, consequently, more oppressed portions of his jurisdiction are seldom blessed with the presence of the European functionary.

If the system now in force in Jalown, as detailed in "Reformers," letter, was to be introduced into British Bundelkand, it would be greatly conducive to the benefit of the poorer classes, who must, ere this, have heard from their brethren the advantages they enjoy; and the probable consequence will be, the desertion of large numbers of the Ryots from the Humeerpore and Bandah Districts, into Jalown—thereby enriching the latter State, and impoverishing the former.

If the plan was to be adopted, the number of Assistant Magistrates required for British Bundelkand would be five; and the most central points, the following villages: For the Northern Division at Raat and Mowdah. Allowing the isolated Purgunnah of Koonch and Buddake to be transferred to the judicial authority of Jalown, by which States they are surrounded. For the Southern Division at Baldowa, Bubberees and Bhowree. Making Bandah the head quarters of the Superintendent, which is very centrally situated, where the two divisions are united.

In a financial point of view, no saving would accrue, unless the Assistants undertook the same duties as those in Jalown, namely, joining the Collectorate with the Magisterial duties, and then the contrary would be the case; and owing to the limited jurisdiction each European Officer would possess, he could readily attend to both duties. Supposing, therefore, this plan was adopted, the following gives a rough sketch of the saving which would accrue:

Present establishment of both divisions, which would undergo revision.		Rs.
Collector of Bandah, .....	2,000	2,000
Ditto of Humeerpore, .....	2,000	2,000
Two Tahsildars of Bandah Division, say average pay per annum 200, .....	2,000	2,000
Six Ditto of Humeerpore Division, exclusive of the Koonch and Buddake Purgunnah, at per annum 200, .....	1,200	1,200
		7,200
Revised establishment on the plan under review.
One Collector or Superintendent of Revenue, .....	2,000	2,000
One Superintendent of Police, if Unvacant, .....	1,000	1,000
Five Assistant Ditto and Collectors of Revenue, say at 500, .....	2,500	2,500
		5,500

Showing a saving of 1700 Rupees. Independent of which, owing to the Assistant Superintendent concentrating the duties of the Tahsildaries of two or three Purgunnahs, much saving might be reasonably expected in the subordinate Native Officer, such as Moohurrars, Zemindars, Peons, &c.

To carry this plan into effect generally, it would be necessary to proceed gradually with one or two districts annually, otherwise it would throw out of employ a number of Tahsildars; but by a gradual process, these men could be absorbed in other districts. No deduction is shown on account of Thannadars, for though this designation may be done away with, and Jemadars substituted, still the present low rate of pay would not be too much.

The traveller passing over the Jumna, from the Doab into Bundelkand, must be struck with the vast difference in the nature and colour of the soil. The latter is strong and marly, and when carefully cultivated, and with a reasonable quantity of rain, is very productive. A great portion of the high lands are impregnated with Khankha, and only applicable to the growth of Cotton. In the southern part of the Humeerpore Elak, near Sopah and Chirkaree, as well as the eastern part of Bandah, in the direction of Guhnee and Bhowree, the soil assumes a totally different character, being of a reddish tint, and much mixed with land. The depth of water, with very few exceptions, is very great, varying from 60 to 100 feet, which totally precludes irrigation, except immediately about the villages, where advantage is taken of the village brick wells, from which the inhabitants draw their supplies. For one or two miles on each side of all river and water courses, however small, ravines of the most formidable character abound; and not only greatly diminish the value of land, but are likewise a great annoyance to travellers. Most of the roads are good, owing to the firm texture of the soil. The people, generally speaking, are quiet and inoffensive, and certainly deserve to receive more consideration at the hands of their rulers, than they now enjoy.

Yours obediently,
B. D. B. D. B. D.

Kollinger, Nov. 14, 1879.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.
DEAR SIR,—I have looked in vain in your paper for a more extended notice of the British India Society. Why is so it?

the Friend of India, to call upon all ranks to do their best in furnishing information, and otherwise co-operating with this noble Society, in (for instance) shewing the real wants of the country, and pointing out the best means of supplying them: without some assistance from people living in India, I fear that with the best intentions, the Society will be little else than a centre of attraction for humbug and nonsense, (vide Mr. Thompson's speech,) a well intentioned man, no doubt; but an injudicious friend is worse than useless. I would call particularly on the Missionaries and the Civil Service. It is in their power to do much good, with but little trouble. Why not have a Corresponding Society in Calcutta, with Wirklich of the principal stations? To the chief one all communications might be addressed by them, sifted, and those worth sending, transmitted home.

I am, Dear Sir,
Your obedient servant,
P. MILLING.

5th Oct. 1839.

P. S. In your Editorial comments on my last note, on honour, I did not expect you would say that the Natives would not have confidence in their own countrymen. I asked a Native a few days back, how a certain Deputy Collector did his work. Just as the Sahib does his, was the reply. The man was asking a favour at the time, and added a few compliments not worth mentioning, but they shewed his opinion of his countrymen.

British Encouragement to Hindoo Idolatry.

TO THE RIGHT REV. THE LORDS BISHOP OF LONDON.

My Lord,—It is not on account of the particular connexion which I happen to have had with the subject of your lordship's motion in the House of Lords on Tuesday last, but it is as a member of the Christian community that I desire to acknowledge myself deeply indebted to your lordship for the zeal and ability with which your lordship on that occasion exhibited the true state of the question which has too lately been agitated, in respect to the propriety of our assisting in the heathenish rites of the Hindoo worship.

Next to the importance of giving to the people of this country an accurate knowledge of the truth as it respects this question, it is material to the right and satisfactory adjustment, that the efforts which are used to that end should not be misapprehended in India, either in respect to their object or extent. And I am persuaded, that if pains are taken to prevent misapprehension, there will be found on the one hand no resentment, and on the other no occasion for alarm.

There are one or two points in respect to which any public discussion of the question in this country is too likely to afford ground for erroneous impressions, either because all those who take part in the discussion have not that intimate knowledge of its several bearings which opportunities of local observation can alone confer, or because such as have enjoyed those opportunities are too apt to imagine that it is not necessary to explain distinctly what to themselves is so familiar and obvious.

I do not mean that in the statements and observations of your lordship any room was afforded for the error to which I more particularly allude: but from the tone of some part of the highly interesting discussion which followed, it is possible that an erroneous idea might be formed of the change which every Christian must desire to see introduced into the practice of our Government in India. It cannot be too plainly avowed, or too earnestly inculcated, that all that was intended by the Court of Directors in their despatch of 1833, and all that is desired by those who wish to see that despatch faithfully acted up to, is, that the Hindoos shall be left to perform by themselves their acts of public worship to their idols, unaided and unmolested by the civil or military authorities of the Company.

Hitherto we have given our positive countenance and active support to this idolatrous worship. That henceforth we should abstain from doing so, is the only change that is contemplated, or ever has been contemplated. Neither the Government, nor any of its servants, have proposed or desired that the natives should, by any compulsion, be constrained to abandon their own religious observances, or to adopt ours.

However slow may be the effect of teaching, example, and persuasion, the most zealous Christian is not only content to look to no other human means of conversion, but he feels himself prohibited by his own religion from resorting to any other.

That we do either intend or wish to propagate the Christian religion by force, in our Eastern possessions, is not imagined by any part of the people there, and there is no point on which we ought to be more careful than to preclude the possibility of such an inference being drawn, from any thing that may be done, or said, in this country.

But, on the other hand, nothing can be more vain and unreasonable than the fears of those persons who imagine that the forbearing to assist in the superstitious and idolatrous worship in the East will excite tumult and hostility, and be resented by the natives as an invasion of their religious freedom.

Blind as their attachment is to their superstitions, they do not require that we shall become idolaters; and I venture to assert, that whenever the Government shall think fit to allow their own order to be executed (as I imagined they did intend to do, or rather had done, when I accepted the military command at Madras), they will find that our native subjects in India are not so unreasonable as to deny to us, even in their hearts, a right to exercise that religious freedom which they themselves so fully enjoy.

I observed that in the debate of last Tuesday evening, in the House of Lords, it was asked by your lordship what was the proportion of Musulmans in the Madras army. It was a natural inquiry, for it is material to consider that in this presidency the idolatrous worship of the Hindoos does not stand opposed to the Christian religion alone. It was replied, by the highest and most respected authority, the Duke of Wellington, that the proportion of Hindoos was by far the most considerable, and that the Musulmans were almost confined to the cavalry regiments.

No doubt that any member of the Court of Directors would have given a similar reply to your lordship, and the information would have been perfectly correct in reference to a period which is now gone by, a period to which his Grace expressly alluded.

At present, however, the following is a just statement of the proportion of the different creeds in the Madras Native Army; viz.

Mahomedans, .....	24,000
Hindoo, .....	22,000
Other creeds, .....	8,000

It will be evident from this statement, which is nearly accurate, that the being compelled to attend at the Hindoo festivals is naturally distasteful (to use a mild term) to considerably more than half the native army.

Speaking of this attendance, a veteran and highly-respectable officer of the Mahomedan creed remarked, "We obey in silence, but (laying his hand on his heart) it makes us dead here." This species of uneasiness, however, is not always so passive. It exhibited itself recently in overt acts at Mysore, and made the presence of two regiments of cavalry and one of infantry necessary to restore tranquility. I refer to one other instance, the abuses it produced from the Hindoo officers and Sepoys of a regiment, a proposal which is worthy of attention. "Let us," they said, "in future attend our own festivals, and you do the same yourselves: we will not hereafter interfere in the Mahomedan feast."

These plain boundaries of toleration are too obvious not to be acknowledged by the most ignorant, and even by the most prejudiced and unreasonable. It is what we have hitherto done upon a contrary system that (on any notion of religious obligations) has tended to produce perplexity, and confused distinctions which ought to have been preserved. We are the ruling power in India, and when the Hindoos see us managing their pagoda-revenues, directing their ceremonies, and presenting offerings to their idols, they can but draw the inference that our Government is countenancing and supporting their heathen worship, willingly and of choice; or, at least, that they are indifferent to the precepts of Christianity, since it is evident that they are acting under no necessity.

The intention of the Directors' despatch, of 1833, was simply to correct this error—to assert practically the claim of equal rights on behalf of all parties where there conscience is concerned.

So far from there being any force in the apprehension that a ground so reasonable cannot be safely taken, I believe this to be precisely the position which it is the most safe and easy, as well as most just, to maintain.

As often as our stations are visited by the preachers of reformed Islamism, who strenuously inculcate on the Musulmans that idolatry is abhorrent to their faith, we must expect that the repugnance of Musulmans to attending at the Hindoo festivals is all ignorance; and I know that it is the opinion of some of the ablest of the Company's servants in the peninsula, that our safest and best position in respect to the native worship would be that of perfect neutrality.

I have thought it important, after reading the debate of the other night, as it is reported in the newspapers, to address your lordship in this public manner, in order that in India it may be thoroughly understood that the well known despatch of 1833 was not a bidder aimed at the religion of the natives, but was intended to secure to every religious denomination the full and free exercise of their own religious observances, and to all a perfect liberty of conscience.

I have the honour to be, My Lord,
Your Lordship's very faithful servant,
P. MILLING.

There are therefore only two Furloughs available on the 1st November of the present year for Civil Servants of ten years' residence.

The applications received up to this date (1st November) including the disappointed of last year are 21, as in the following list, arranged according to the date of application: Messrs. John Muir, S. B. Edmondstone, F.

P. Taylor, B. J. Colvin, P. C. French, W. J. H. Moore, R. D. Manches,

J. Cumine, C. B. Quilston, H. Nisbet, W. P. Good, A. Fraser, A. Reid,

R. H. Scott, W. R. Timlin, W. M. Dixon, P. Macneven, A. Shank, E.

Dever, C. W. Fagan, W. H. Woodcock, H. Berrford, John Lawrence,

H. F. James, M. S. Gilmore, W. A. Pringle, G. W. Baty, J. H. Crawford,

A. A. Durin, G. L. Day, W. H. Young.

But of the above applicants, Mr. Manches is not entitled to Furlough, because he took a Furlough for health as Junior, and drew the passage money and reduced allowance of £105 per annum for three years, having been absent from the 8th December 1927 to 23rd November 1931.

remain in Europe after their three years of Furlough are complete; it would seem that there are grounds for extending the period to the 31st March as to include all the furloughs about to expire; giving however to each applicant the same preference they now enjoy in respect to those as to subsequent lapses to the date of the next distribution on the 1st November 1930. (Signed) H. T. PRINSEP, Sec. to Govt.

1st November, 1929.

The President in Council having considered the above report and the several Applications for Furlough submitted with it—Notwithstanding that the following Rules be established for the grant of Furloughs to Members of the Civil Service in modification of previous rules passed on the 8th October 1928 and 19th September 1929, and that the same be applied to the Furloughs of the present year.

I. Civil Servants desiring Furlough Rules for grant of Furloughs. must as heretofore submit their applications as to as to reach the office of the Secretary to Government in the General Departmental Secretariat, or before the 1st November of each year, when the Furloughs then available to complete the number 51, will be appropriated to the senior applicants, who have completed ten years of actual residence, provided they are subscribers to the Civil Annuity Fund and have not forfeited their claim by a previous absence as Juniors, as to as to bring their case within the others contained in the 2nd Part, of the letter of the Honourable Court of Directors, dated 24th December 1924.

II. "The applicants on the 1st November shall further have the benefit of Furloughs that may lapse by return or expiry to the 31st March next at which date, but during this period, applicants under Medical Certificates, will be entitled to preference, and such applicants may as heretofore take their Furlough, if any Furloughs are available, at any period of the year."

Applying the above Rules to the applications now before the Government, the following will be the order of admission to the benefit of Furlough in the present season.

The applicants entitled to Furlough on the 1st November ranged in the order of Seniority are as follows: 1 W. A. Pringle—2 R. H. Scott—3 H. Nisbet—4 P. Macneven—5 W. R. Young—6 G. L. Day—7 J. A. Durin—8 Edward Dever—9 A. Reid—10 W. H. Woodcock—11 A. Fraser—12 H. F. James—13 G. W. Baty—14 W. J. H. Moore—15 R. F. Taylor—16 W. R. Timlin—17 S. B. Edmondstone—18 J. Muir—19 B. J. Colvin—20 P. C. French—21 H. Berrford—22 M. S. Gilmore—23 J. Cumine—24 W. P. Good and 25 W. M. Dixon.

Of these Messrs. W. A. Pringle and R. H. Scott are admitted from this date.

Mr. W. R. Young,

J. Cumine, and

being applicants under Medical Certificate, will be entitled to take the first Furloughs that may lapse from this date.

Messrs. J. H. Crawford and G. W. Fagan, whose period of ten years residence will be completed on the 7th of November of the present year, will also be entitled to avail themselves of any Furloughs that may lapse after that date, their applications having been accompanied by Medical Certificates.

After Furloughs have been allotted to the above applicants under Medical Certificate, and to any other similar applicants whose cases may be held before the Government of Bengal or of the North Western Provinces, in the interval between the 1st November and the 31st March, the Furloughs that may lapse until the date last mentioned, shall be allotted, as they fall in, to the above applicants in the order of their rank in the above list.

For their assurance as to the time when they may reasonably expect to obtain Furlough, the following list of the dates when the Furloughs will respectively expire, if the incumbents do not previously return, is published for general information:

1 H. B. Brownlow, .....	12th December 1936.
2 A. Leding, .....	24th Ditto "
3 A. Neave, .....	24th Ditto "
4 C. Phillips, .....	10th January 1937.
5 C. M. Callicott, .....	10th " Ditto "
6 H. Fideck, .....	16th Ditto "
7 J. P. Gubbins, .....	21st Ditto "
8 H. F. Maxwell, .....	19th Ditto "
9 W. S. Alexander, .....	27th Ditto "
10 C. G. Jackson, .....	3d February "
11 T. G. Ybar, .....	19th Ditto "
12 H. Fraser, Secy., .....	23rd Ditto "
13 A. Cunningham, .....	23rd Ditto "
14 E. J. Longman, .....	23rd Ditto "

The President in Council considering that under the above rules a full allotment of Furloughs will be made to Members of the Bengal Civil Service, and that the exigencies of the Public Service will not be met without the inconvenience of a large number of Governors being absent that is provided for by the rules established; deems it expedient to require that leave to proceed to Europe on account of private affairs, shall be sparingly granted to Members not entitled to the privilege of Furlough, and that applications for such leave be not complied with, except under special circumstances to be explained to the satisfaction of the heads of the respective Governments of Bengal and the North Western Provinces.

The 8th November, 1929.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal has been pleased to appoint Mr. W. Taylor to act as Sub-Agent for the Central Division of Cuttack, from the 1st instant, for twelve months, during Mr. A. F. Donnelly's absence on Medical Certificate.

H. T. PRINSEP, Sec. to Govt. of India.

THE PRECURSOR STEAMER.—A meeting was held at Mr. Turton's house last Saturday afternoon, for the purpose of organizing the plan of a Precursor Steamer; when it was resolved to appoint a permanent Committee of Management, which should be empowered to form Rules and Regulations for the general government of the Association, to be hereafter submitted to a general meeting of Proprietors. It was likewise resolved, that in case the Comprehensive Plan should be carried into execution, an immediate offer should be made to its Directors by the Association of their vessel and engines, on equitable terms. This effectually relieves the present plan from the charge of being a rival or competitor of the Comprehensive Plan, and vindicates the propriety of its being considered but the precursor of a scheme in which it is to be absorbed, as soon as the larger arrangements are mature. It was provided that the Association should not be considered as formed, until four hundred shares had been taken; and that if it was found that the whole Eight Hundred Shares were not taken by the time the vessel was ready to start on her first voyage, any shareholder should have the power to call on the Association to take over his share at prime cost, or to dissolve the Association, by sale of the property. This is, we think, a fair and equitable arrangement. We cannot admit the idea, that the whole Eight Hundred Shares will not be taken before the "Precursor,"—for so she must be christened,—is ready to start; but if this should be the case, there will be no lack of purchasers for such a vessel in England; and no loss can possibly be sustained by the sale. This appears to be an additional reason for building her at home. Two hundred and forty-five shares were subscribed for in the room.

We may now congratulate the community at this, and the Madras Presidency, and in the Island of Ceylon, on the prospect of having a quarterly communication with Egypt, which shall render us independent of the good will of the authorities at home. We are confident that the Precursor Steamer will not long be permitted to run, without a companion. No sooner had the Great Western performed one successful voyage, than eleven other Steamers, many of much larger size, were immediately contracted for, and more than a million sterling of capital was poured into this channel of traffic. We cannot expect, nor, indeed, do we need, so large an addition to our means of intercourse; but when it is once established, we shall not ~~lack~~ assistance to complete it, so as to embrace a monthly communication. But if it should so happen that, contrary to all experience, we are constrained at this Presidency to content ourselves with the Precursor for several years to come, still we hold that it is better to have one vessel than none at all. That without the active measures which have now been adopted, we should have been left for years without any direct communication from Calcutta, Madras and Ceylon, appears to be confirmed by every fresh insight we obtain of the state of feeling which prevails at home, on the subject of the Comprehensive Plan. The London Correspondent of the Agra Utkhar, who is innocent of any knowledge of our recent proceedings, writing on the 16th of September, says—"There is not a chance of the Court of Directors agreeing to the Comprehensive Scheme, so you had better make up your minds to be consistent and stick to Bombay." This is strong collateral evidence, that nothing is intended by the Home Authorities, but to wear out our patience by delays. We have, moreover, been enabled, since our last number, to light on the explanation given by the Ministry, relative to the magnificent scheme of steam navigation between Europe and America, and the Colonies themselves, which they have undertaken to patronize. We find they have agreed to contribute, in ten annual payments, the sum of two hundred and forty lakhs of Rupees. We subjoin the report of Mr. Wood's speech. It is impossible to observe the alacrity with which the Ministry have entered upon this vast plan, without feeling a conviction that if they had viewed the Eastern Comprehensive Scheme with the same favourable sentiments, with which they have regarded the Western Comprehensive Scheme, it would long since have been carried into effect.

"With respect to the conveyance of the North American mail to Halifax, the <sup>St. Lawrence</sup> service which governs, it had received in answer to public advertisement was for 45,000*l.* a-year, the mail to be conveyed once a month. This appeared to government much too high, and they had consequently made a private bargain, by which, for a slightly increased sum, they would have doubled the quantity of work performed." Government had entered into an engagement with an individual for the performance of the service once a fortnight at 50,000*l.*; so that, at an increase of 5,000*l.* they would get twice the service done, including a communication with the St. Lawrence, and a conveyance from Halifax to Boston. They had contracted for the conveyance of mails to Halifax once a fortnight; for the conveyance of mails from New Brunswick to Quebec once a fortnight so long as the river was opened, and the conveyance of mails from Halifax to London for the sum of 60,000*l.* a-year; so that at an increase of 15,000*l.*, they had more than twice the service done, for which the lowest tender in this country was 45,000*l.* (Hear, hear.) With regard to the conveyance of mails to the West Indies, no contract had been entered into. It was done by private tender. His conviction was, that neither in North America nor the West Indies would it be worth while for any one to undertake the service who had not, from their interest in the colonies, a much further interest in the performance of the service than the mere sum paid by the government. A number of gentlemen deeply interested in the welfare of the West India colonies had come forward and offered to perform the service for 240,000*l.* They made their offer to the Treasury, who referred the matter to the Admiralty, who had agreed to accept the offer. He would not detail the service to be performed. At present there was a communication by sailing vessels twice a month to the West Indies, and once a month to Mexico. The communication with the West Indies was, therefore, imperfect, and the inter-colonial communication was exceedingly bad. With all the foreign trade there was no communication at all. There was no communication between Havannah and the English islands and the consequence was, that if the Governor of Honduras wished to write to the Governor of Jamaica, the letter must come round by England. If specie was wanted to be sent from Mexico to the West Indies there was no mode of doing it, except by sending a ship of war for that purpose; nor was there any communication to be depended upon between the West Indies and the United States of America. These deficiencies would now be supplied in the following manner: two steamers of four hundred horse power each would cross the Atlantic every fortnight to the West Indies

From these, branch steamers would go to the different islands; steamers would likewise proceed to the different colonies of Guiana, Demerara, and Berbice, to the Caymans, to Panama, to Honduras, to the Havannah, to Vera Cruz, and the south-western parts of the United States. In addition to this, steamers would proceed from the Havannah to New York and Halifax. The number of steamers to be employed would amount to fourteen, besides four sailing schooners; and by this means a fortnightly communication would be opened between this country and the whole of the West Indies, the northern part of South America, the southern parts of the United States, Mexico, and the western coast of the South American Continent. This would be carried into effect early in the summer of 1841, which was as soon as the necessary arrangements could be effected. With respect to the terms, the more he looked at them the more was he satisfied with the arrangements that had been entered into—more particularly when he considered the enormous expense of providing these boats, and of sending out coals from this country. No offers had been made to the government from other parties. It was true the terms of this arrangement had been made for ten years, as persons could not enter into any contract for a less term; but it had been made an article in the contract, that if during the ten years, any great improvements should be made in steam navigation, the government should have the benefit of them."

BYRCE ON NATIVE EDUCATION.—"We have read the volume of Dr. Bryce with greater satisfaction than we could have anticipated, and have been more surprised by its excellences than by its faults. It is given to the world as a history of the Mission and Schools of the Church of Scotland; from which, as a text, a right conception of Native Education and Contention in India generally is to be drawn. It is, therefore, in part a narrative, and in part a disquisition. The narrative is both partial and defective; yet it is without its value. In his first three Chapters, Dr. Bryce professes to relate the rise, progress and present state of the General Assembly's School and Mission; to explain the encouragements to undertake the Mission, as they presented themselves on the field of action; and to shew the state of feeling towards Christianity and Christian Missionaries before that Mission arose. During the whole of the Author's progress through this course of observation, he appears to be perplexed by the contending influence of opposite feelings—extreme complacency, approaching to boastfulness, in the pre-eminent excellences of the Assembly's School and Missionary Scheme, and consciousness of the very tardy entrance of his Church upon the work of evangelizing India. Indeed, as he was the first Minister of his Church that appeared in Bengal, it is his own reputation that is in question, quite as much as that of the ecclesiastical body with which he was connected: and truly Dr. Bryce and the predominant party in the Scottish Church at that time, were very much of the same mind and spirit. He had written a successful Prize Essay "on the Means of Civilizing India, and introducing into it the knowledge of the Gospel;" and to that distinction, he tells us, he owed his appointment as the first Presbyterian Chaplain on the Bengal Establishment. If his essay really spoke his mind, one cannot help suspecting that he must have been chosen for his appointment, because of the assurance he gave, that he would trouble nobody, either at home or abroad, with any attempts to disturb the spiritual slumbers of India. He very honestly confesses, that he came "to the scene of his labours strongly impressed with a belief, that should he step beyond the pale of his own countrymen, he would find every attempt to shake the Hindoo in the faith of his fathers, to be futile and unavailing." Our curiosity is piqued by the confession, to learn what suggestions a man in this state of mind could have offered for the communication of the Gospel to India, so excellent as to be rewarded with a public prize. We should not have thought of reading an essay by Dr. Bryce of former days, for information or instruction on Missionary principles or expedients; but we shall look at it now, were it but for amusement. In the mind whither he himself has described above, he received his appointment in April, 1814: and it was not till after ten long years, that his mind was so changed as to be convinced, that something might and should be done for the conversion of the Hindoos. "The Scheme of the Church of Scotland," he says, "had its origin in 1824." A memorial was presented to the General Assembly of that year from Dr. Bryce, which led to the appointment of a Committee to devise a plan for the propagation of the Gospel in India: and in 1825 the Committee made a Report which was highly approved. Their plan was thus explained: "It would be desirable to establish, in the first instance, one Central Seminary of Education, with Branch-Schools in the surrounding country, for behoof of the children of the Native population, under the charge of a Head Master, who ought to be an ordained Minister of our National Church, and not less than two Assistant Teachers from this country, together with a certain number of additional Teachers to be selected by the Head Master from those Natives who have previously received the requisite education. That the Head Master (being, as already said, a Clergyman) ought to embrace opportunities, as they occur, to recommend the Gospel of Christ to the faith and acceptance of those to whom he finds access. That, with this view, he ought to court the society of those Natives—especially who have already received a liberal education, and, if encouraged by them, ought to put into their hands such tracts, illustrative of the Import, the Evidences, and the History of our Christian faith, as may be sent to him for that purpose, under the authority of the General Assembly, and ought also to preach, from time to time, in the hearing of such persons, or others who may be induced to attend him, either in the Hall of the Seminary over which he presides, or in such other convenient place as may be afforded him."

It is interesting to compare this first sketch of the Assembly's Mission with its actual development. There is a strong resemblance between the two; but the original scheme has, upon the whole, improved in its progress. It has acquired more earnestness, and has parted with a portion, at least, of the inordinate reliance at first placed upon the distinction of rank and education.

Dr. Bryce seems to have persuaded himself that his mind was brought to adopt these new ideas and schemes, and, therefore, to recommend them to his Church, by the peculiar signs of the times. He is not content with stating that by 1824 the Natives had begun to exhibit a marvellous readiness to receive European instruction, and to pursue independent inquiries in various departments of knowledge; but having about that time begun to acquire some insight into Hindooism, its subtleties, and its influences, he takes it for granted that the discoveries which were new to himself, were new to all the world, and marked a new era both in the decline of Hindooism and the propagation of the Gospel. It is perfectly amusing, to find him prefacing the truest representations of Hindoo speculation and doctrine with the phrase, "the astonishing Missionary now found," &c. &c. No Mis-ministry had been ignorant of these wonders, for more than a quarter of a century before. The fact is, a change had come over the Scottish Church at home, and over European society in India, that, in a manner imperceptible, perhaps, to himself, opened the eyes of Dr. Bryce to a number of things of which he had been altogether unconscious before. About the time when he left Scotland a mighty impulse was given to religion there. The Missionary spirit, for years before struggling for life and scope, was fanned by personal appeals of men who had been themselves in scenes of Missionary labour; and, as war drew to a close, the world was opened in the most inviting prospects to the Churches of the United Kingdom. The enterprise of strife and war, was replaced by that of Christian zeal for the salvation of men. The imagination of youth, and the thought and sympathy of age were directed to the regions of heathen ignorance; and the whole Church was moved to lengthen her cords and strengthen her stakes. For a while the Church of Scotland, as a corporate body, lagged behind in this service. But at the same time she was favoured with the ministry of Chalmers, Andrew Thompson, and a number more of holy and energetic men, who, by the blessing of God, carried with them the hearts of the people in the cause of evangelical doctrine and enterprise. They likewise led with them the youthful ranks of the ministry; and though the moderate party did not cease to exist, it was greatly weakened; and, yet more, it was obliged, in order to retain any influence or reputation at all, to learn of former opponents, and catch a little, at least, of their fervour. So again in Calcutta, every denomination of Christians had been putting forth their strength; and even the High Church party of the Church of England, under the auspices of Bishop Middleton, had declared for Missionary exertion. For any Protestant Minister then to have persisted in disregard of such efforts, would have been to signalize himself in the most unfavourable manner. Besides, Dr. Bryce about this time ceased to be alone in the pulpit of St. Andrew's Church; and his first colleague, Dr. Brown, was a man who would never have shamed the do-nothingness of his Senior, if it had not been, with much address, abandoned. Both upon Dr. Bryce, and upon the party with which he was connected at home, a happy pressure from without had been exercised; which left them the single alternative of defying public opinion, by perseverance in indifference, or going along with it in the adoption of Missionary projects. To their honour, they chose the latter. We regret, however, there should appear so little consciousness of the influence under which they acted. We regret especially to find so strong a symptom of the continuance of some unpleasing traits of Dr. Bryce's ancient Indian character, as the total silence in his book respecting his colleague, Dr. Brown. We confess we cherish the memory of that good man with mournful affection. We remember that on his arrival in India, he told us it was his purpose to devote the whole of his income, beyond what was necessary for his support, to the furtherance of the gospel, and he would begin with the institution of Native Schools. His English services were of a corresponding character. When he preached, the walls of St. Andrew's echoed with unwonted sounds, and its empty seats began to fill with an interested and affected audience. But though, in a sense, he was successful in provoking to good works, there was a sad display of prostration in the business. He was unsustained by sympathy amongst his own people, and chagrined and fretted by jealousy and opposition; and after having paved the way for the happier progress of his successors, he met an early death, and has been too easily forgotten.

We have fault to find also with Dr. Bryce's history of the Assembly's School and Mission. Dates, numbers, and economy are handled very loosely. He tells us that the scheme had its origin in 1824, when the country was ripe for its introduction; but he does not say when the Mission and School actually came into existence. This looks as if he wished to cast a veil over the fact, that it was not till 1830 that Dr. Duff arrived in Calcutta to commence his labours. Now we really think the success of the Assembly's School has been so highly distinguished, as to admit of a free and unreluctant acknowledgement of all the previous backwardness about its institution. There it is now, one of the noblest ornaments and benefactions conferred on the country; and however we may regret that it was not seen sooner, it would be exceedingly ungracious to substitute reproach for the delay, instead of gratitude for the gift when it actually came. We look in vain to Dr. Bryce's volume for any distinct description of the Assembly's Mission. It is true there seems to be constantly in his eye an ideal personation of a Missionary of the Kirk; who is just the person to realize every thing he conceives to be good and expedient in the Missionary enterprise, and besides whom there is no other to be depended upon for such precise adaptation to the exigencies of the work. Other Missionaries need not, however, be offended with Dr. Bryce's partiality: for his ideal Missionary is by no means a faultless being, which it must be mortifying not to be thought exactly to resemble. We are persuaded the Missionaries of the Kirk themselves will be amongst the first to disclaim conformity with it. True it has its good and comely features; but it is sadly wanting about the heart.

Of the progress of the Assembly's Mission, Dr. Bryce gives us little more information than this—that it has been extended to the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay, its Missionaries have increased from one to eight, nearly a thousand pupils are in attendance at the Calcutta Seminary alone, (an exaggeration, by the way, for which there was no occasion), and co-operation has been established between the Presbyterian Church and Mission in India in the higher department of theological education—that is, provision has been made for introducing Natives into the Ministry of the Gospel. These are important points certainly; but in a professed history we had reason to expect something less meagre.

It is due to Dr. Bryce to observe, that, in recording the educational efforts of his own communion, he exhibits a very friendly spirit towards others who have engaged in the same work. But his enumeration of them is singularly defective; and his account of their operations gives no idea of their importance—which however cannot be reasonably complained of, when he treats so summarily the affairs of his own Institution—if so we may call it. We are not sure, that there may not be a lurking sarcasm in the mention of Bishop's College; in which our author remarks:—"and the liberal funds that have been provided, have enabled it to support a Principal and two Professors from the English Universities." Yet the supposition of an intended sneer is at variance with the general tone of Dr. Bryce; and, therefore, we shall discard it. To the general views of our author we shall attend next week.

THE HURKARU UPON HINDOO IDOLATRY.—We owe our Contemporary some little apology for having unintentionally misrepresented his opinions on the subject of Idolatry. Our apology would have been more ample, if he had not been in some measure accessory to our error, by the peculiarity of his expressions. When the Hurkaru told his readers, that the funds of the State in this country, meant nothing more or less than the money of the Hindoos, and that the application of public funds to the support of Idolatry, was to be regarded as a restitution, we were naturally led to conclude, that he considered that restitution, and the measures which it involved, in the light of a sacred duty. Few who perused that article, could, we think, have come to any other conclusion, than that which we formed. We are delighted, however, to find that we were mistaken, and that our Contemporary is not friendly to the support of idolatry from the resources of the State, and would by no means perpetuate the superstitions of Heathenism, by giving them the invigorating influence and sanction of the public authorities.

It is strange to observe the misconceptions which continue to prevail on this question, after the clear and repeated explanations which have been given of the views of those who adhere to the dispatch of the Directors of 1833. We ask for a perfect and impartial toleration of all creeds, but for nothing more; and we are told to be cautious how we insult the religion of a hundred millions! We desire that Government should abstain from its officious interference with the shrines of idolatry; we ask that its own officers should not be deputed, as the Board of Revenue deputed Mr. Atherton, two years ago, "to elect a High Priest for a Heathen Temple;" and we are told to be wary how we touch the religious creed of the Hindoos! We desire that Government should be entirely neutral on the subject of religion; and our opponents tell us that we must avoid the insanity of propagating Christianity, by the power of the State! In words, we both appear to require the same thing; but in reality, our wishes are diametrically different. By not touching the religion of the Hindoos, our opponents appear to mean that we should continue to give it the support of the State. When they talk about not propagating Christianity by public authority, they appear to mean that Government should discourage its propagation, by throwing the whole of its influence into the scale of idolatry. We are told that we owe protection to the religion of the country. We admit the obligation in its largest and most legitimate sense. But does protection signify the election of High Priests by the Officers of Government; the firing of salutes in honour of the birth-day of the gods; or the careful superintendence of the economy of the Temples by the public servants of Government? If so, then the word protection, like the term toleration, must have acquired a novel and oriental signification, after it had doubled the Cape. If the duty of protection means an active interference in the concerns of the temples; then have we denied all protection to the thousands of shrines at Benares, the metropolises of Hindooism; and to the most holy establishments at Brindaban. And, strange to say, this denial of protection has never been made the subject of complaint by the victims of our neglect. Instead of asking for the public interference, and requesting to be put on the same footing as Juggunnath, so obtuse is their intellect, that we question whether any visitation would be more deplored by the Priests of Benares.

We are not a little surprised to find our Contemporary wind up his article with the following singular paragraph:

"And we must make a stand too, upon this very point, and question, whether the 'idol patronage' complained of, is prejudicial to the interests of Christianity. That is but short-sighted Christian Policy, which would endeavour to abolish a few idolatrous rites to the manifest injury of a general gospel-propagation. Christianity is not to be carried into the hearts of a nation by a comp-de-main; and we must confess that we see no more unwholesome method of establishing the true religion in this heathen land, than that which, as a primary step, fills the bosoms of the heathen-men with inextinguishable hatred of their Christian brethren, and makes them regard every measure of their rulers with fear, and suspicion, and mistrust."

"That is but short-sighted Christian Policy, which would endeavour to abolish a few idolatrous rites, to the manifest injury of a general gospel propagation." Does the Markhu need to be told, that neither we, nor any who think with us, have ever asked for the abolition of idolatrous rites; that we advocate now, and have always advocated, the policy and the necessity of allowing perfect toleration to all religious rites, except such as resemble the Suttee? "Christianity is not to be carried by a comp-de-main." Is a free and perfect toleration of idolatry, and nothing more, carrying Christianity by a "comp-de-main?" In Benares, Government has never interfered with the shrines; they are exactly on the basis on which we desire all shrines in India to stand. Has Christianity been carried by a "comp-de-main" in that city? The measure we urge is represented as likely to "fill the bosoms of Heathen men with inextinguishable hatred," &c. What! will the abolition of the Pilgrim Tax fill the Heathen with "inextinguishable hatred?" Ninety-nine out of every hundred temples have received no other protection from our Government, than that of being let alone, and their Priests have desired no other? Will it fill the Heathen with "inextinguishable hatred," if we remove our unhallowed hands from the hundredth fraction of shrines upon which we have laid them; if we allow the Priests of Deoghur to elect their own High Priest, and Karamut Ali to manage the Enamburah at Houghly, at his own pleasure, as he petitioned Government that he might be allowed to do? And who, we would ask, begged Government to take upon itself the patronage of the temples, more especially at Madras? Was it the Heathen themselves? The truth transpired about a twelvemonth ago, by the publication of a document which had long slumbered in the archives at the India House, and which the Directors peremptorily refused permission to publish. That singular document gave us the origin of the connection with idols at Madras. Thirty years after we obtained possession of the country, Mr. Lionel Pless, Collector of the Company's Jayghcer, addressed the Board of Revenue, stating that the magnificence of the festivals and processions of the celebrated Pagoda of Conjeeveram, had miserably fallen off, and he therefore solicited the good offices of the Board and Government; and Government did accordingly interfere; and thus grew up the holy alliance of the Madras Government with the idol temples. And are we to be told that this interference, which originated in the Hindooism of the Christian members of Government, not in that of its Native subjects, is so necessary, that to withdraw it, would fill the bosoms of Heathen men with "inextinguishable hatred?" Our Contemporary considers that the cessation of this interference, and the adoption of pure toleration, would make the Natives regard "every measure of their rulers with fear, and suspicion, and mistrust." Other alarmists go farther, and predict the expulsion of our Government, and the loss of the empire. To all this there is a simple and solid answer. If the Mahomedans, who held the empire for six centuries, during which period they cast every contumely on the religion of the unbelieving heathen; pulled down the temples, even in the 'Holy City' itself; built mosques on their ruins, and degraded the Hindoos by a discriminating tax, were never ejected from a single province, then there is no fear that we shall ever be expelled the country; that we shall even excite "fear, suspicion and mistrust," by adopting the principles of an enlightened toleration; by placing the one per cent. of temples on the same footing with the ninety and nine; by allowing the pilgrims to approach their gods untaxed, and leaving the priests to manage their own temples unfettered. A singular outcry was raised, when it was proposed to admit Christian Missionaries peaceably and unofficiously to propagave Christian truth. The public was assured that India would be lost to Britain, if the fanatics and Methodists were allowed to visit it. Twenty-six years have since elapsed; the number of Missionaries has increased tenfold, and the country is more secure than ever. The same outcry was raised when the abolition of female immolation was proposed. Dire visions of blood and massacre, havoc and revolution, were conjured up to frighten us from the task of mercy. Ten years, wanting just eight days, have now passed away, since these fires were extinguished, and the "Ganges flowed unblooded to the sea," and peace and security still reign throughout the country. So will it be in the present case also. When the reform we advocate has been consummated, another proof will be afforded of the fact, that the violence of European prejudices and fears constitutes one of the most formidable obstacles to Native improvement.

THE KRISHNAGUR CONVERTS.—A pleasing report of the continued progress of the Gospel in the district of Krishnagur has been sent us, and our readers will find it in another page. It will be seen that the number of professed converts has increased to 4,000; and a fruitful season has enabled these poor people to vindicate their character from the imputation of sordid motives in embracing the Gospel. They are repaying the money spent on their relief in the time of their destitution. This is satisfactory in respect of them. Of the care of the Missionaries to avoid encouraging sinister professions of attachment to the Gospel we have had a proof of a different kind. Some men who must have been seeking to get the upper hand of their Zemindars, by the interference of the Missionaries, and been disappointed, have travelled down as far as Serampore to see whether they could not succeed better here. We need not say, their stay was short.

NATIVE MORALS.—The last Mail brought us the report of a debate on Indian matters in the House of Lords, in the course of which the Bishop of London openly impugned the morality of the Hindoos, and declared that they were not to be believed upon their oath. This attack called on Sir Charles Forbes, who entered upon a long and acrimonious correspondence with His Lordship, with the intent to prove that these allegations were entirely groundless. The subject has also been taken up by one of our Contemporaries and the Bishop has been roughly handled for his supposed uncharitableness. We had thought that the question of Native morals had been long since decided by a mass of evidence, to which European residents had only to add the successive corroboration of their experience. The doctrines which have now been bronched by Sir Charles Forbes might have given some surprise, did we not constantly perceive how little there is that may be objectionable or absurd, which will not find defenders. While the Murkaris and the Englishmen are denouncing the Opium trade in terms of just indignation, other oriental journalists, and the Atlas and Spectator in London, are defending its morality. Even the sanguinary slave trade of the Portuguese, has the warmest defenders and supporters among the Lisbon journalists.

To determine whether a Hindoo is to be believed on his oath, we must remember that oaths are forbidden by the Hindoo Shastris, and that fourteen generations of a man's ancestors fall from heaven, as soon as he dips his fingers in the little brass basin, which contains the holy water of the Ganges. The man, therefore, who has sufficient audacity to overcome these strong religious scruples, is not considered by his own countrymen as likely to be over scrupulous about telling the truth. Hence testimony which has been confirmed by an oath, is generally, if not always, regarded as of inferior worth.

Sir Charles is certainly one of the most fortunate of men. He has been fortunate in his intercourse with the Natives of India, and has discovered virtues which had escaped the scrutiny and resources of most other men. He is still more fortunate in having amassed wealth in this country, which, with some subsequent additions, is popularly estimated at a million sterling. He is most fortunate, in that a statue is about to be erected by his friends at Bombay, that their admiration of his character may be perpetuated to the latest posterity. Never has such wealth and such honour rewarded mercantile exertions in India. It is not uncharitable, however, to suppose, that the fortune and the statue may have had a considerable share in the formation of Sir Charles's opinion; at least that a sense of gratitude may have sharpened his recollections of Hindoo virtue. The supposition is honourable to the worthy Baronet. It would not only be difficult, but ungrateful, for him to believe that the community which has voted him a statue can be so degraded in character as the Bishop of London describes it. But Sir Charles has allowed his gratitude too wide a license when, among other assertions, he affirms that "No people can be more scrupulous in the observance, not merely of an oath, but of their word, of the obligation of which they entertain as high a sense as any man in England." Even Hindoo modesty would blush at the excesses of Sir Charles's gratitude.

Far be it from us to insinuate that there is no truth to be found among the Natives of India. The intercourse of life would stand still altogether, without some admixture of it; but it may be that truth and honesty in this land are the exception, and the exception must not be taken to decide the question of national character. If we were to admit that the glowing description of Eastern virtue drawn by Sir Charles was true, and that the Native community was distinguished for honesty, morality, and a rigid attachment to truth, we must admit also that this virtuous state of society is the greatest moral phenomenon in the world. It has hitherto, we believe, been received as an axiom, that a people cannot be more holy than their gods. But here we find the case reversed. Though the lives of the gods present nothing but one unbroken succession of the most atrocious vices, we find the people who are influenced by these divine examples, the most moral people under the sun! Though the Hindoo Shastris have taught, that a lie uttered with a view to benefit a Brahmin, is an act of merit, we find the people firmly adhering to the truth! Though the sacred books prescribe a varied and voluminous ritual of holy texts to be repeated for the destruction of an enemy, we find the people animated with the purest feelings of benevolence! If this be, indeed, the case, and if these virtues have grown up in a country, in which religious precept, as well as example, has so strong a tendency to produce vice, we need look no further for miracles.

There can be no more satisfactory mode of deciding the question at issue, regarding the existing state of morals, than by an appeal to the opinion of the Natives themselves. If we are not greatly mistaken in our experience, they not only admit, to its fullest extent, the national depravity, but maintain that the state of society could not be otherwise. The Hindoo Shastris have in one instance, and one instance only, ventured upon the difficult ground of prophecy, and predicted that in this last age of the world, corruption would be so general, that vice should be to virtue in the proportion of three to one; that the disproportion should increase till the last spark of virtue had disappeared, and the moral world was covered with the unrelieved gloom of vices. The Hindoo looks around and finds the prediction fulfilled. Instead of vainly lamenting the general depravity, he involuntarily exclaims, How truly have the Shastris predicted the vices of this age! While some writers would persuade us, that virtue is the rule, and vice the exception, the Hindoo boldly maintains the opposite doctrine, and regards the vice of the age as a proof of the divine origin of his holy books. The deeper the depravity, the more strongly is their veracity vindicated. A Hindoo can feel little gratitude for descriptions of Native virtue, such as those of Sir Charles, which, if true, would inevitably destroy the credibility of writings which form the basis of his creed. Instead of mourning over the national depravity, the Hindoo views it as growing out of the irremediable decrees of fate, which has ordained that the world shall grow more corrupt, as it grows older. Hence the general degradation of society excites no feeling of ingenuous shame or compunction, nor is it considered to be either an individual or a national duty to remedy it. This naturally produces a universal moral prostration; as though the nation had been delivered up to some mighty genius of evil, against whose power it would be both vain and impious to struggle. Hence arises the necessity of some new religious dispensation, which shall destroy this morbid feeling, and invigorate the moral sensibilities, and again open a heaven of hope upon this benighted land. We rejoice to find that there are Natives both in Calcutta and Bombay, who feel keenly the reproaches which have been cast upon the national character. It is a token that their intercourse with Europeans, and their acquaintance, however faint, with the doctrines of universal morality, have not been without beneficial effect; that it has taught them that their beloved Native land is not doomed, through the next four hundred and twenty-seven thousand years, to hopeless and increasing depravity; and that if India would ever take its station among the enlightened and civilized nations of the world, it must throw off that spirit of resignation to evil influences which their holy books encourage. We rejoice to find that there are Natives, increasing too in number, who, in spite of their Shastris, dare to believe that India can be regenerated.

SINGAPORE INSTITUTION FREE SCHOOL.—The Fifth Report of this Institution, for 1838-39, has lately reached us; and we are happy to learn from it, that so much progress is making in education, both Christian and Native, at Singapore, and that so much harmony and combination prevail in the conduct of the work. The exact number of scholars is not stated in the Report; but there has been a daily attendance of about 170 throughout the year. They appear to be all divided into an Upper and a Lower Department. In the former there are 56 boys of various nations, whose education appears to be conducted entirely in English. Amongst them is included a class of respectable Portuguese lads, who have been sent from Macao to the Institution to acquire a knowledge of English. Those pupils who are of the Protestant persuasion, are exercised in the Catechism and Scriptures on Saturday; the attendance of others on that occasion is left to their own inclination, and none have availed themselves of the opportunity of seeking religious instruction. The Lower Department consists of Malays, Chinese, Tamilians and a few Native Christians, who are taught in English according to the Pestalozzian system in the forenoon; and in the afternoon are instructed in their own language by Malay, Chinese, and Tamil Masters, and under the superintendence of gentlemen, who have devoted themselves to the several languages, of the teaching of which they take the oversight.

The Institution is assisted by Government to the extent of Co.'s Rs. 434-8-6 monthly; and nearly an equal sum is received in donations, and scholars' fees. The prosperity of the schools has induced the Committee to apply to the British and Foreign School Society for a Teacher from the Borough Road, whose arrival is anticipated in this singularly commercial style—"the Committee hope that the Teacher thus ordered, will not be more than other six months in arriving." We trust when the article comes to hand, it may answer expectation. The freight and shipping charges are estimated at £100. The Committee are likewise constrained to provide farther accommodation, both for the Teacher and the increasing number of scholars. The requisite addition to the present building will cost Sp/ Drs. 2,800; which must be raised wholly by subscription. Assistance was asked from Government to the extent of 1,000 Dollars; but it has been declined. The object is an excellent one, and we shall be happy if our notice of it should elicit any contrition on the Continent of India for its accomplishment. The present state of affairs in China and the Straits will, of course, affect deeply the local sources of help; and there is so much the greater reason for assistance being sent from other quarters.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 21.

— Mr. Thomas Ferguson, long well-known as a merchant in Calcutta, after a long succession of reverses, has paid the debt of nature, at the age of fifty-six. The papers also mention the death of Major Napier Campbell, of the Artillery, an able writer, well known to the readers of the Military Chronicle of the Engländer.

— The Governor General was at Timmesour, on the 9th instant.

— The papers continue to be filled with discussion on the subject of Mr. Turton's Precursor. It is to be hoped the meeting, on Saturday, will relieve the journals, by at once adopting the plan, and setting it in motion.

— A singular case of oppression is detailed in the Bombay papers. Mr. Balfour, a midshipman of the Indian Navy of ten years standing, mentioned to the Editor of one of the papers, that he thought the Adelante Steamer was overladen with Government stores. This information was communicated to the public by the Editor; and the Captain of that vessel immediately placed the officer under arrest, on the ground that he had knowingly communicated false information to the Editor of the paper. The charges were preferred to the Adjutant General, four or five months after the arrest had taken place, and after Mr. Balfour had been confined in a most unhealthy spot. Six months after the arrest, he was honourably acquitted of the charge. This is a case of wanton oppression, which calls for the interference of the Governor.

— Mr. Brooke, a gentleman of independent fortune, a distinguished member of the Yacht Club, the son of Mr. Brooke, so long and so well known as the Chief of the Provincial Court of Moorsheadabad, who has recently sailed at his own expense to Borneo, for the purpose of scientific research, has just returned from that Island to Singapore.

— The report that Shah Kaman had dismissed all the English Officers at Herat, and had determined to form an alliance with Bokhara and Persia, is contradicted by his day's Herkura, on the authority of letters, dated the 22nd September, which state that Russia having disclaimed the acts of her agents in the East, the King of Persia is likely to resume her negotiations with the English Court, and Kaman to remain faithful to his engagements.

— A rumour is given in the papers, that on the appointment of Mr. Dampier to the office of Superintendent of Police, Government intend to sanction the appointment of some Deputy Superintendents at 400 Rupees a month, for the districts of Behar and Patna. So inefficient an experiment, however, can lead only to disappointment.

— Sir Henry Fane has returned to Bombay from the Hills, with his health much improved.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 22.

— An Envoy has arrived at Lahore from Shah Soojah, with the presents mentioned in the treaty tripartite, the period of which occasioned so much merriment in the House of Lords. The Envoys of the King, who had been sent to Simla to the Governor General, have returned to their master; and we guess that the rumour, published some time ago, that the Minister had refused a passage through the Punjab to the returning portion of the army, is altogether unfounded.

— A caravan of merchants proceeding through Yarkand to China, with goods, the greater part of which consisted of Opium, has been stopped; the drug confiscated, and the merchants cast into prison; which leads to the supposition that the crusade against Opium, originates in the settled determination of the Cabinet of Peking to exclude it on all sides, both by sea and land, from the empire. It is a singular feature of the times, that there should suddenly have arisen so extensive a combination against this drug. It is stopped, confiscated at the same time in Tartary and at Acheen.

— The rain which has been experienced during the last quarter of the moon, though too late for some of the crops, has proved very "refreshing" to others, and the prospects of the season have been brightened not a little thereby.

— On Tuesday last, about fifty members of the Mechanics' Institute assembled to hear Mr. Anderson's Introductory Lecture on Mechanics.

— The control over the Superintendent of the Province of Cachar, in criminal matters, has been transferred from the Commissioner of Dacca to the Civil and Sessions Judge of Sylhet.

— Mr. Shoefft, a distinguished German Painter, after having travelled overland through Asia Minor and Assyria, and resided for some time at Bombay, has taken up his abode in Calcutta. He is engaged professionally during his brief stay in the city of Palaces. He intends to visit America, and to return to his native land by way of England.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23.

— It is stated that our present Advocate General, Mr. Pearson, intends to quit his post, and to retire to England.

— The troops who are marching back through the Khyber Pass, to the Punjab and the British territories, have experienced the greatest difficulties and privations. Vast numbers of the camels have died, through the impossible character of the road, and the intenseness of the cold; and much baggage has been accordingly abandoned. A band of armed robbers had attacked the rear guard of the second column, a jemadar, a havildar, and a sepoy were killed, and seven sepoy wounded.

— Letters received from the Camp at Cabul, explain the events which took place at Ghizni, and which made such a noise here, in a manner which appears entirely to exonerate Sir John Keane from the charge of cruelty. One of the letters says:—"The massacre at Ghizni is a complete fabrication, for it was impossible for troops to behave with greater forbearance or for prisoners to have been better treated; instead of 3,500 men, there were about 700 killed; the women were put into comfortable quarters, with a guard to protect them, and the men taken prisoners (in number nearly 2,000) were all, except a few, relieved the second or third day; and I am told they are now settled in Ghizni, where good bazars have been opened and grain in abundance procurable. I remained in the Fort for several days, and can vouch for the truth of what I have stated—so much for the veil of mystery that hangs over the massacre at Ghizni." Wally Mahomed occupied a house with about 60 armed men, from which a constant fire was kept up the greater part of the day; he was told that if he continued firing the house would be destroyed, and every man found in it put to the sword; he swore by all that he held sacred that he would not allow another shot to be fired, when shortly after, three sepoy were killed, and Lieut. Golding, of the 35th, wounded by him or his people, and on a report being made to Sir John Keane, he was naturally very much annoyed, and declared he would put every man to death for such treachery. Wally Mahomed, however, alone suffered, and all the rest were, I believe, set at liberty."

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25.

The Courier states that the Treasury which was some time since in a state of exhaustion, which was happily unknown at Ava and Catmandoo, and which obliged the Government to borrow at eight per cent, is now filling fast; and the public authorities are prepared for another brush either with China, Burmah or Nepal.

— A meeting of the East India Steam Association was held at Mr. Tertius, on Saturday afternoon, which was attended by about thirty. For an account of it we refer to our editorial article.

— The Chamber of Commerce has solicited the President of the Council to despatch the Enterprise Steamer to China, to assist in protecting British interests there; but His Honour has declined to interfere, until a communication has been received from the Naval Commander-in-Chief.

— An instance of cruelty, revolting to every feeling of humanity, is related of Dost Mahomed. A poor messenger in the employ of Mr. Macnaghten, the Envoy, was sent some time before the camp advanced, with letters to persons of influence at Cabul. Being discovered and seized, he suffered one of the letters to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy, but Dost Mahomed caused the poor fellow's body to be ripped open, and then ordered him to be hanged. Government has settled a pension for life on the man's widow.

— All apprehension regarding the conduct of Shah Kamran, at Herat, has been dispelled by the arrival of letters of a late date from thence, which give a very favourable account of the disposition of the Shah. Lieut. Pottinger is said to be very much respected, and at Court is esteemed as an excellent servant of Government. He appears constantly in the Afghan costume.

— The Government of Donna Maria has determined to put an end to the distractions which have disturbed the Portuguese settlements in India, by sending out European garrisons.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24.

— The Englishman publishes a letter from Darjeeling from a gentleman who has resided there during a whole tercer-month, and is, therefore, perfectly competent to speak of the climate. He describes it as a lovely climate, though neither so warm in summer, nor so cold in winter, as England. But the place will do for us. To have a Sanatorium not four hundred miles from Calcutta, wherewithal thermometer, at the hottest season of the year, is not more than 70; and at the coldest not lower than 24, is enough to attract to it the attachment of all those who are doomed to the hot sultry liver-consuming climate of the plains.

— Orissa is threatened with a famine. In consequence of long continued drought, half the rice crop has been destroyed; and the price has risen from forty to sixteen seers the Rupees. The only remedy is simple importation; (the Warrior Doherty is already on her benevolent voyage thither with food,) and a subscription for the inhabitants to purchase it when it arrives. "The measure which some of our good friends would advise, of forcing the merchants to sell cheap, might produce an instantaneous, though short relief, but by the general insecurity of property which it would induce, would very soon bring about intense harm."

— The Princes of the House of Tippoo are going to build a splendid Mosque in one of the most populous and most frequented parts of Calcutta, to commemorate the benevolence of Government towards them. Who will now say that gratitude is an exotic in India?

— Fifteen hundred Government Camels have already died on the march back from Cabul to our own territories. These animals may be extremely useful on the sandy plains of Arabia, but are little adapted for the rugged mountains of Afghanistan.

— The Englishman gives us a veritable sigille of the signature of the celebrated Baz, Charles Dickens, which reminds one strongly of the villainous autograph of good Queen Bess.

— We are getting on apace in India. A new Bakery has been established at the Strand Mills, which turns out fifty mounds, nearly two tons, of bread every day.

— The Bishop of Léon, the Vicar Apostolic of Ava and Pera, arrived in Calcutta some days ago.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 27.

— The Englishman states that in consequence of Lord Auckland's displeasure at the military arrangements in Afghanistan, Sir William Cotton will return to Cabul to assume the command of the army. This, however, wants confirmation.

— The reason of Sir Jaques Nicoll's not having been sworn in on Monday, was his desire to wait the receipt of a reply to the letter which he has addressed to Sir Henry Fane, announcing the arrival of his Commission.

— Mr. James Hume, a Barrister of the Supreme Court, has determined to establish a Weekly Journal, to be called the Eastern Star. The first number will be published at the Englishman's Office, on Sunday, the 3th of January.

— Some clue has been found to the daring robbery of about two lakhs of Rupees of Promissory Notes, which were abstracted from the Post Office, either here or at Lucknow, some time ago. We regret to learn that one of the individuals implicated is a European.

LAND TENURES.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIRs,—You are, doubtless, aware, that in Bengal there are different grades of under tenures; from the Puttooy Talookdar, Esaradhar, Moorasceedar, Gauteedar, &c., down to the Chassee Jotedar, or actual cultivator of the soil. The last mentioned individuals are always unable to pay the piper under every circumstance; they have neither courage nor means to seek redress against their heartless tyrants, however much they may be oppressed. But the intermediate Ryots between these and the Zemindar, are the description of Ryots alluded to in my last communication, who take advantage of the equitable clause to evade payment of their rents, even in defiance of the celebrated 'Kanoon Hifum', or Reg. VII. of 1799. These intermediate Ryots, or Gauteedars, are in many instances equal to their Zemindar in point of wealth and influence; and it may happen that a Court Amal, or Vakool, or their relatives, may be a party in these suits; what chance, then, could a petty Zemindar have against a powerful enemy of this kind, who will not only harass him alone, but instigate others of his village to follow his footsteps, until the ruin of the Zemindar is completed, by the sale of his Talook, for arrears of Government rent? After they have once thrown their cases into the Civil Court, should the Zemindar proceed to recover his revenue from them, under the provision of Reg. VII. for any subsequent period, they immediately petition to have the cases removed to the civil tribunal, under the provision of Reg. VIII. Section 13, of 1831; and thus effectually keep the Zemindar and the 'Kanoon Hifum' at bay. That what I have stated is not mere idle speculation, but actual fact, the numberless cases of this kind pending before the Civil Court will sufficiently testify. Should this subject meet with attention, I may venture to offer a few suggestions on the "New Sale Law," which you have so kindly invited. Till then,

I remain,

Your most obedient Servant,

OBITU.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIRs,—Will you kindly allow me a brief space in your columns, if no sabbler pen should have communicated on the same topic. In a widely circulated and useful monthly Periodical published in your City, I have with much surprise and regret noticed in its number for March last, "Happily for the character of Christian Britain, the Opium trade is at an end;" and again in June, (the last number received) under a short article headed, "Extinction of the Opium Trade," the Editors remark, "We have long prophesied this; its accomplishment is not, however, the less painful.

Can any thing be more disgraceful or humiliating than the end of this traffic," &c. &c.?

The impression this will produce, especially on those at a distance from the scene of action, is self evident; but I regret to say it will prove a most erroneous one. Such statements—most unintentionally I am sure—do injury to the cause, and defeat the object in view, by leaving its advocates to suppose their humane efforts and prayers have been successful, and that China is freed from the vorna which still preys on her vitals. I shall not now do more than point out the inconsistency and contradiction which appears in these repeated notices of the termination and extinction of the Opium trade, while the fact is, it not only exists, but it has never for a week ceased. At no period since the commencement of the present troubles, have their coasts been left by our regular traders in the drug; nor has there been a single when Opium could not be purchased from the shipping lying in sight from this spot, except in the interim caused by rapid sale and slow arrivals. The hazard to the Chinese dealer is, indeed greatly increased by late proceedings; but what is the result? Lucrese profit, numerous executions, a wider field of exercise for cruelty and torture, and well filled prisons; while the trade on the coast is carried on at the cannon's mouth. And if it is asked, from whence is the source of the misery and distress which has fallen on this unhappy people? The answer must be, it proceeds from those who willfully persevere in this most odious and sinful traffic; who sacrifice at the idol shrine of wealth, and exhibit a stolid indifference, when told of the bitter fruit of their doings in the sufferings of their fellow men. The truth can no longer be concealed; and all who either directly or indirectly promote this contraband trade, this source of exquisite misery, cannot escape the charge, can no longer plead ignorance. Many in the secret of their own bosoms feel the sting which they have not the moral courage to extract, by a resolute and instant renunciation of this unholy traffic. Oh! that this black page was torn from the records of our commerce with China, never again to be restored; but as yet it stands as a monument, as a witness against our nation; and if it stain our annals during the coming year, let us no longer assume among the kingdoms of the earth, the character of enlightened, civilized, Christian England; for hereafter it must, in consequence of late events, assume a national character; and if persisted in, obtain a national sanction. Here I would pause and enquire, why has no expression of public opinion been heard from the city of Palaces? Any infringement of civil rights would arouse you as one man; any severe shock to commercial credit is a signal for meetings and committees. Let there be rumours that personal safety is endangered, and every means are speedily devised to meet the coming storm; but on the subject of the Opium traffic all is still as death, except in advertisements, which show your city to be the fountain whence the poisonous streams flow. It is not so with regard to the Government connection with Idolatry, with the Cooly Trade; and is this a lesser evil? Is it not as demoralizing; does it not entail a far greater sacrifice of human life; is not the contagion spreading far and wide like a pestilence, from the southern isles of the Archipelago, and throughout that fair portion of God's creation, whether under British, Dutch or Independent rule; into Siam, Cochin China; through the length and breadth of this Empire, and its countless myriads; into Tartary; and who shall set bounds to this pestiferous blast, which, during half a century, has reached its present fearful height? Surely this state of apathy is to be deplored; and when it is known that among your clergy, your public servants, your merchants, and others, there are many who shudder at the miseries we are the means of inflicting, it is matter of surprise. The present appears a fit time for more energetic measures, and Providence seems to call on the wise and benevolent to unite their voices, that this heavy curse may be removed. Friends of humanity, the Opium trade is not at an end; it is not extinct in China; it thrives rapidly among the Chinese, Malays and others, in and around our possessions in the Archipelago, and it never will cease, while a single chest leaves India. Cut off the supply from the source. A few hundreds will be forced to resign bright, yet delusive hopes; but let them exercise their honourable calling in the pursuit of some branch of commerce more reputable in itself, less injurious to others, and beneficial to all; then millions on millions will bless you; yes, generations yet unborn.

I.

P. S. The provisions of the English here are cut off, and the servants taken away. Some of the ladies have accepted the offer made by a Committee of Management, and retired on board ship. We have merchant shipping in abundance, but not one vessel of war of any nation. If the Chinese carry out their measures with vigour, the British must leave, if they will permit us. We have rumours that more hostile measures are intended, and all the disposable small craft are anchored close to our houses, as a measure of precaution. The British Superintendent is still here, but his family have left. The excitement is great, and we see not where it will terminate. I do not think the Chinese will relax.

THE MAHOMEDAN RULE.

Although we do not go the entire length of our Correspondent, A Hindoo, we think it but just to give his letter a place, after having inserted that of A Mahomedan; but here the controversy much ceases. That the following letter is the genuine production of A Hindoo, no one who reads it will doubt.—Ed.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

DRAW, SIR,—Oblige me by giving insertion to these few following lines in a corner of your much esteemed periodical.

There appeared, in the last number of the Friend of India, an ably penned letter, written by "A Mahomedan."

Your Correspondent has there vituperated, in a very strange manner, against the English Government, and extolled, to the skies, the Mahomedan one. Now I am firmly persuaded, that if there be any greater insult that can be offered to the English Government, it is by comparing it with the Mahomedan. Your Correspondent points out some isolated instances of English injustice done to the Natives. But the whole Mahomedan Government in India, present a continued series of woes and sufferings of the most appalling description. The Mahomedan rule turned this "garden of Asia" into a wilderness. The characters of the Mahomedan Emperors, with hardly any exception, are identified with all that is mean; all that is derogatory to human nature. India, during the reigns of these Emperors, presents nothing but a picture of bloodshed, of rapine, of carnage, of devastation, and such as are unparalleled in the annals of history. Any one, who has studied the pages of Indian history, will, I am sure, agree with me in what I say, in toto. Need I introduce any instance? Why, the cruelties of a Mahomed of Ghiani alone are such, as almost beggar description. The names of an Allu, a Coffer, a Nadir Shah, and an Aurangzeb, and of a host of other Mahomedan tyrants, send a thrill of horror into my marrow; and are, in themselves, associated with every thing that is disagreeable to humanity. Does your Correspondent think, Mr. Editor, that the lapse of a few years has been able to efface, from the minds of men, the name of that inhuman monster—that scourge to mankind, Serag-ul-dowla, who is said to have taken a diabolical pleasure in witnessing the most horrible scenes in nature—in causing boats full of men, women and children, to be drowned in the midst of the river, &c. &c.? No; as long as oppression shall be detested, and justice respected, and liberty adored, so long shall the names of these Mahomedans be held in abhorrence! In short, to embody all the Mahomedan acts of atrocity and injustice in a condensed, systematic, and arranged form, would, indeed, fill up volumes. But to present your readers, Mr. Editors, even with a very brief detail of some of the instances of Mahomedan cruelties, would be to harrow up their feelings. For humanity, with horror, shudders at, and recoils from a recital of these.

Suffice it to say, therefore, that the Mahomedan administration in India is replete with innumerable instances of treachery, the most premeditated—of rapacity, the most violent—of disimulation, the most profound—of cruelty, the most unheard of; and of barbarity, the most shocking!!!

Thus far the Mahomedan Government. As to the English Government, against which he has directed his shafts, it is my most firm conviction, that nothing but the influence of providential interposition could have placed us under it. No one, save those bound down by the trammels of national prejudice, (as your Correspondent evidently seems to be in heart and mind,) will dare deny the blessings they enjoy under the present Government.

The English Government, it might be maintained, without any fear of contradiction or danger of exaggeration, with all its defects; (and defects there must be found in every Government,) with "its imperfections on its head," has done immense good to the Natives. For it cannot be denied, that India, notwithstanding a great deal remains to be done for her, owes a debt of gratitude to the English nation, which will not easily be repaid. To her present enlightened rulers, she is indebted for order in the room of anarchy; peace, which she could never before enjoy under the Mahomedans.

From such a state of things, it necessarily results, that all classes of Natives, whether rich or poor, residing within the precincts of the British dominion, do now enjoy that inestimable good, security of life and property. Commerce, which under the Mahomedan misrule, was almost extinct, has again reared its head. In short, the salutary change which is working under the auspices of the English Government, in the social, moral, and the intellectual condition of our countrymen, unquestionably corroborates that the English Government in India, in spite of the defects existing under it, has been strikingly beneficial to the general welfare of the Natives. That much more good might be done to our country, by another system of Government, is, I think, undeniable; but that much has been already done for her amelioration, it will be foul ingratitude in us Natives to deny. They are disseminating the seeds of Education among the Natives, which will elevate their character, and raise them, one day, in the scale of civilization with the nations of Europe. They have given them liberty of conscience and of religion.

They do not, like the Mahomedans, with drawn swords in their hands, ask their subjects either to embrace their ruler's faith, or have their lives put an end to.

But, behold, I say again, the change which India has undergone, under the English Government! Already has, we see, a spirit of enquiry begun to pervade the educated portion of the Native community. In short, that moral darkness, which from time immemorial has enveloped thousands of our benighted countrymen, is now being dispelled by the all-enlightening rays of knowledge. A HINDOO.

GRIEVE.

We have been favoured with the following extract from a letter of a Soldier in H. M. 18th, which will be read with interest, notwithstanding the full details which have been already published, relative to the capture of that place.—Ed.

DEAR FRIEND,—I hope these few lines will reach you, and find you, and the members of your Society, doing well. It would give us much pleasure to hear again from you; and if you have printed another Report, or are about to get one printed, I should be glad to receive one from the Society! It so happens that our regiment is to remain at Cabool or Jelalabad for some months; some say 12 months. On this account we feel anxious to hear from time to time how the Societies are getting on in the provinces.

The number of Temperance men with the Army of the Indus is 42: about 33 of them have marched upwards of 1300 miles; and the remainder about 8 or 400 as Temperance men; only one of the members died; he is not included in the above number; he died at Candahar, and I trust he is now in a better world, for he was a remarkably good man. At times the marches were long, from 14 to 18 miles per day. Water has been often times breakish and bad, and for some days was very scarce. Part of the road the troops were put upon short rations, and had neither tea nor coffee to drink, and many were the days we had to wait for hours under a scorching sun for the tents and baggage to come up, as several regiments had to march together, and the roads were bad. On account of the weakness of the regiments, and the number of sick, the men had very hard duties to perform on this expedition. The Bombay regiments had forced marches for several days, in order to reach Candahar and Ghiznee. The Fort and Citadel of the latter place was stormed and taken on the morning of the 23d July, in less than three hours, without the aid of alcohol. Since the 8th of July, the whole of the European portion of the Army had to march, and perform all their duties without spirits, or any other substitute, on account of the Commissariat stock of Arrack having failed. They were two months without it, during which time scarcely any crime was committed. Now that Arrack is again issued, crime is greatly increasing. The European soldiers have suffered severely from bow-sprains on the road, and many a drunk-drinker has attributed it to the effects of bad water; and it has plainly appeared to us, that spirits will not counteract the effects of bad water on the system. Our regiment has buried about 70 men, and numbers died from diarrhoea, or bowel complaint.

Here tea is from 12 to 18 Rs. per seer; and as for coffee, I have seen none. We are obliged to use, as a substitute, burnt wheat, and very common sugar; but when one pie worth of goat's milk is added to it, it is tolerably palatable. It goes by the name of Radical Coffee in Camp. The Natives carry Cabool spirits about the Camp for sale privately, but several of them have been detected and their liquor destroyed. They have soon found out our propensity for drinking.

Yours sincerely,

G— G—.

Camp Cabool, 20th September, 1839.

THE MISSION AT KISHNAGHUR.

Many of the friends of Christianity may perhaps have heard of the blessings which God has been pleased to bestow upon the ministry of the Gospel in the district of Kishnaghur Nuddes, but as the Report which was given of it in February last, by the Venerable Archdeacon Dealty, may not have reached all, a short outline of the Mission is herewith afforded. The Mission was begun in 1826, and was situated at Kishnaghur and Nuddes, (the headquarters of Braminism) and the Sacred Scriptures introduced and read in these Schools. In the beginning of the year 1833 public preaching, in the streets of the town of Kishnaghur and its villages, was commenced, on Mr. Deery's return from Europe, with the assistance of three well qualified native young men, and continued for about two years. The people were roused by the word, which was evident from the violent opposition at that made; and Kishnaghur being the station where the courts are held, and the people from all parts of the zillah having to come to town, witnesses of one line of another, had ample opportunities of hearing the Gospel themselves and carrying the news home to their respective villages. In the same year, 1833, a new class of instruction was opened by Mr. Deery, by his becoming acquainted with a sect called "Karta Bhogian," "the worshippers of the Creator," whose chief principle is, that by devotion God will give them eyes, and then they will obtain a sight of Him, and through that sight, salvation.

To these people was preached the great mystery of Godliness, "God manifest in the flesh." They became gradually attentive, but took a whole year for consideration. In 1836, about 30 persons of the "Karta Bhogian" were admitted into the Church by baptism, and divine worship regularly performed amongst them, and numerous villages were also visited, and the number of enquirers of this class of people amounted to 500, but though they seemed favourably disposed, they were not yet decided.

In 1837, Christian worship had been begun in ten surrounding villages amongst those who professed themselves candidates for baptism, and the enquirers who promised fair were very numerous. They extended already as far as above 30 miles north east. However made, no report whatever was made; the residents only of the Station knew of it—one of whom, Mr. Nibet, erected at his own expense a chapel in Solu, where the Rev. Mr. Alexander now resides. Besides two other chapels had been erected in other places, one the year previous, the other the same year. In places where there was no chapel, the Missionary performed worship under trees or in private cells of the state of things.

In 1838 the country was laid waste by a visitation from Heaven by an inundation of the Jellinghies, and all the crops just ready for the sickle, were destroyed. This chastising and awakening hand of God had no doubt its desired effect in rousing the dormant spirit of many, and on the other hand, there was ample opportunity for Christian sympathy to show her sweet and cheering character. Little indeed it was that the residents could afford to give to such great numbers, and they only had been informed of the circumstances. The Missionary thought it best to go on quietly, in order not to attract the notice of enemies, or to excite high expectation in the minds of Christian friends; therefore neither the number of the converts nor their sufferings were made known, till in December, 1838, he sent down a Calcuttist to the Bishop of Calcutta, to inform him of the state of things.

In January, 1839, a kind visitor, Mr. T. Smith, of Calcutta, came, as it were, accidentally, and saw the congregations, and was struck with the deep poverty, and still deeper piety, as he expressed it, of the new converts. In February, 1839, the Bishop not being able to visit the Mission at the time, requested the Archdeacon, Mr. Dealty, to go up to Kishnaghur. He in company with three more clergymen, the parables of old, refused when he saw a great number of converts. A report was then for the first time given to the public, which appeared in the April number of the Christian Intelligencer.

The state of the Mission now differs from that made known in February in three respects. Then the number of converts was 3,000, now they are about 4,000; then the number of villages was 55, now they are 72; then they were in distress, now they are repaying the money lent them. Their increase in number, in the days of prosperity, was equal to that in the days of suffering. Another cause of rejoicing is the formation of an Auxiliary Society at Kishnaghur, in connection with the Church Missionary Corporation Committee of Calcutta. This Society will ease the hands of the Missionaries from temporal affairs, such as buildings, &c. &c. They will collect Subscriptions and Donations, and engage to see the same applied according to the wish of the Donors.

The Mission, in its present condition, being as to spiritual things a garden which God has blessed, wants for that very reason, the necessary care of labourers. Numerous chapels, schools, dwellings for teachers, &c. are also indispensable, and as the funds of the Committee of Calcutta are in such a reduced state, that they cannot afford any material aid, the Kishnaghur Committee of this station have come to the resolution of sending a circular to the friends of Christianity in different stations, to assist them in these respects for the furtherance of the Gospel. The Committee have been further encouraged to take this step by a letter from the Army of the India, dated Calcutta, containing a list of Subscribers from the Officers of that Army to the amount of 680 Rs.

The Committee trust, therefore, that their appeal to other friends will not be in vain. Subscriptions and Donations will be received by C. Steer, Esq., Secretary, and Mr. Fuller, Treasurer to the Kishnaghur Society, and by the Secretary and Members of the Corresponding Committee of the Calcutta Church Missionary Society.

Note by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Calcutta.

"The Bishop of Calcutta is happy, to attest the entire truth of the above account, as far as he knows and believes."

Note by the Local Committee.

The above Report having been drawn up by the Rev. Mr. Deery, and its accuracy attested by the Lord Bishop after a personal visit to some of the villages, the Kishnaghur Committee have much pleasure in circulating the same, in the hope of obtaining subscriptions from the Christian public, in furtherance of the objects contemplated in the Report.

C. STEER.

Secretary to the Kishnaghur Church Missionary Association.

Kishnaghur, November 9th, 1839.

RELIGIOUS.

REVIVAL.—MR. DUGLAS, OF CAYERS.—The village of Spital has this week been the scene of a series of religious meetings of a somewhat unusual nature. Mr. Douglas, of Cayers, is at present residing there, and has been holding meetings and delivering addresses on the subject of "revivals," assisted by several clergymen of the neighbourhood. On Sunday the children attending Spital Sabbath School were assembled in Mr. Whitthouse's chapel (Church of Scotland) when an appropriate service was presided by the Rev. Mr. Dick, from Cayers, (Baptist.) After the sermon, Mr. Douglas went into the desk, and delivered an address on prayer and revivals, distinguished for its clear style and fervent spirit. The church was crowded throughout with a most attentive audience. On Monday, according to intimation, a revival meeting was held in the school-house, which was quite filled. Mr. Dick delivered an impressive address from the parable of the importunate widow. The Rev. Mr. Whitthouse, besides Mr. Dick on revivals, Mr. Douglas read an interesting letter from Killyth, giving an account of the revival in religion which had just taken place in that neighbourhood, dating from the delivery of a sacramental discourse some weeks ago. Neither the demeanour of the audience, nor in the language and sentiments of the speakers has there been anything to offend the most fastidious taste. The address of Mr. Douglas, in particular, besides being enlivened by an elegant and pleasing style of composition, the faculty of which he possesses in so eminent a degree, were remarkable for their display of a mind zealous without fanaticism, and enthusiastically pure without one drop of cant or pharisaical assumption.—Herick Advertiser.

THE BIBLE PRINTING BOARD.—We understand that a communication has been received from the Lord Advocate, in reply to inquiries which were addressed to him, touching the powers of the new Board with respect to notes and marginal references. His lordship expects that the appropriations which the Disasters entertained on this point will be removed, and the matter settled in a satisfactory manner. The inquiry having proceeded from Disson, and his lordship's answer being addressed to them, we naturally felt "satisfactory" to mean satisfaction to the Dissoners. His lordship is perfectly aware that nothing will satisfy them short of the entire removal of all notes and references from the control of the Board, and the limitation of their powers to the mere verbal and typographical accuracy of the text. We hope, then, there is to be no more slippery work, and that an instruction will be issued to the Board to limit its cares accordingly.—Scot. Lib.

MUTUAL RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.—Let a church be divided into companies of twelve or fifteen persons, to meet in private houses, according to their respective localities. Let this company meet weekly, and let the most competent of its members be appointed its president; let him read a lecture the first night, and let that lecture form the subject of conference the second night; and so on reading and conference alternately, which will occupy nearly three months. Let this be done, let two or three brethren engage in prayer on every occasion, and we predict with confidence that a year so spent will prove an era in the history of the church which has wisdom enough to make the experiment.—Pat.

EDUCATION.

The British and Foreign School Society is about to erect a building for giving a trial to the system of tuition, which is in practice at the normal school at Glasgow, and of which so much has been heard lately—the "simultaneous" system. The system merely consists of lectures delivered to classes of about fifty children at once, who are seated on rising benches in front of the teacher, very much on the plan of infant schools. The negative characteristic of the process is, that children are not employed to teach children.—Christ. Adv.

SCIENTIFIC.

PROCESS OF PHOTOGRAPHY, OR SUN-PAINTING.—The history and details of M. Daguerre's photographic process were communicated by M. Arago to the Academy of Sciences of Paris, at the sitting of the 19th instant, from which it appears, that in prosecuting his labours M. Daguerre was assisted by a M. Niepce, deceased, with whom the discovery originated. The French Government has, therefore, awarded a pension to the surviving son of M. Niepce, as well as to M. Daguerre, in return for the publication of the process. Soon after the announcement of M. Daguerre's invention, a claim to the merit of the discovery was made on behalf of M. Niepce by his friend M. Bauer, who shewed specimens of the new art produced by M. Niepce in 1827, and, what is more extraordinary still, M. Niepce possessed the means of taking impressions from his sun-graven plates, and M. Bauer has some impressions of photographs engraved pictures. We made no allusion to this statement of M. Bauer at the time, preferring to wait till the rival claims were settled; there is now no longer a doubt that M. Niepce originated the invention, which M. Daguerre has perfected so far as fixing the picture on the plate only, not in taking impressions from it.

M. Daguerre's recipe is as follows. A copper-plate plated with silver, its surface well cleaned with diluted nitric acid, is exposed to the action of the vapour of iodine: this forms the first coating, or ground; which is, inconceivably thin, and requires to be perfectly even. The plate thus prepared is placed on the table of the camera obscura; and after remaining eight or ten minutes, according as the subject or the degree of light may require, is withdrawn; at this stage of the process, however, the most practiced eye will not discern the slightest trace of the action of the light on the prepared surface. The plate is then exposed, in a proper apparatus, to the vapour of mercury; and when heated to 60 degrees, the picture appears as if by magic. A singular, and hitherto inexplicable circumstance, requires to be noticed in reference to this part of the process, namely, that the plate must be in an inclined position; and that if it be placed directly opposite the aperture whence the vapour of the mercury escapes, the result will not be satisfactory. Lastly, the plate must be dipped in hyposulphate of soda, and afterwards well sluiced with distilled water; the operation is then complete.

The merit of the plate must necessarily be considerable, and the chemical process requires nicety and skill; so that the expense of the photographic picture will not be so trifling as might be supposed, especially when accidental failures are taken into account. By this process, it is to be borne in mind, the picture appears on the plate as it does on the disc of the camera—that is, with its forms and shadows painted dark on a white ground. In the simpler process invented by Mr. Fox Talbot, by which the solar ray set on the prepared paper, called photogenic, the light and shades of the real objects were reversed, and the picture is painted white on a dark ground. Mr. Talbot's method of preparing photogenic or sensitive paper, consists in washing fine writing-paper over first with a solution of nitrate of silver, then, with bromide of potassium, and afterwards with nitrate of silver again; drying it at the fire after each operation. He also imitates coloring on copper-plate, by staining over a piece of glass with a solution of resin in turpentine, and blackening it by the smoke of a candle; on this ground the design is traced with the point of an etching-needle, and the sensitive paper being placed behind the glass exposed to the sun, the rays of light passing through the transparent lines, act upon the paper, and leave the design imprinted in a brown hue. The experiment can be repeated as often as may be desired. This last-mentioned process, however, is but printing by sun-light from etching on glass: it is curious enough, but without comparing to the drawings of light, where nature delineates her own image reversed on paper; and this again is far inferior to the beautiful perfection of M. Daguerre's process, by which the external picture is depicted in miniature, light for light and shade for shade, to the minutest gradation of each—only colourless.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

GOVERNMENT STEAM-SHIPS.—It is not generally known that a steamer of very large tonnage is to be launched in a day or two from Chatham Dockyard. It will have been begun and finished in the incredibly short space of eight weeks. We are informed that this extreme expedition is an experiment under the direction of the Government, in order to ascertain the shortest possible time in which such a vessel can be completed. The number of hands have been unlimited. In fact, the men are working on her at the present moment as thick as bees in a hive, and they are allowed to make as many working-hours per day as they can. The sum apportioned for the labour, we understand, is 4,000*l.*; and should it not cost that, the surplus is to be divided among the men. The experiment has excited the greatest possible interest in the neighbourhood.—Greenwich Gazette.

THE NEW POLICE ACT.—The following are important clauses in this Act, which received the Royal Assent on Saturday, and which ought to be made known to every resident in London. One of the clauses declares "that no licensed victualler, or other person, shall open his shop, within the Metropolitan Police District (15 miles in a straight line from Charing Cross), for the sale of wine, spirits, beer, or other fermented or distilled liquors, on Su. Sabbath, Christmas-day, and Good Friday, before the hour of one o'clock in the afternoon, except for refreshment for travellers."—Another clause enacts that "every person licensed to sell in exciseable liquors, within the said district, who shall knowingly supply any sort of distilled or fermented liquor to any boy or girl apparently under the age of 16 years, to be drunk on the premises, shall be liable to a penalty not more than 2*0*s.; and upon conviction of the second offence shall be liable to a penalty not more than 4*0*s.; and upon conviction of a third offence shall be liable on penalty not more than 5*0*s." A third, "that after the 1st day of January next every person who within the metropolitan police district shall use any dog for the purpose of drawing or helping to draw any cart, carriage, truck, or barrow, shall be liable to a penalty of not more than 4*0*s. for the first offence, and not more than 5*0*s. for the second or any following offence." And it is enacted by a fourth, "that it shall be lawful for any householder within the metropolitan police district, personally, or by his servant, or by any police constable, to require any street utensil to depart from the neighbourhood of the house of the householder on account of the illness of any inmate of such house, or for other reasonable cause, and every person who shall sound or play any musical instrument in any thoroughfare near any house after being so required to depart, shall be liable to a penalty of not more than 4*0*s." The following provisions should also be generally known:— "That every person shall be liable to a penalty not more than 4*0*s., who, within the limits of the metropolitan police district, shall, in any thoroughfare or public place, commit any of the following offences, that is to say—1. Every person who shall, to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers, expose for show or sale (except in a market lawfully appointed for that purpose), or feed or fodder any horse or other animal, or show any caravan containing any animal or any other show or public entertainment, or show, bleed, or carry any horse or animal (except in cases of accident), or expose, exercise, train, or break any horse or animal, or clean, make, or repair any part of any cart or carriage, except in cases of accident, where repairs on the spot is necessary. 2. Every person who, by negligence or ill usage in driving cattle, shall cause any mischief to be done by such cattle, or who shall in any wise misbehave himself in the driving, care, or management of such cattle, and also every person who excite a dog or endeavor to drive such cattle who shall wantonly and unlawfully pelt, drive, or hunt any such cattle. 3. Every person who shall ride or drive furiously, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person, or to the common danger of the passengers in any thoroughfare. 4. Every person who shall cause any cart, public carriage, sledge, truck, or barrow with or without horses, to stand longer than may be necessary for loading or unloading, or for taking up or setting down passengers, except hackney carriages standing for hire in any place not forbidden by law, or by means of any cart, carriage, sledge, truck, or barrow, or any horse or other animal, shall wilfully interrupt any public crossing, or wilfully cause any obstruction in any thoroughfare. 5. Every person who shall lead or ride any horse or other animal, or draw or drive any cart or carriage, bridge, iron, or barrow, upon any footway or crossway, or faster any horse or other animal, so that it can stand across or upon any footway. 6. Every person who shall roll or carry any cask, tub, hoop, or wheel, or any ladder, plank, pole, show-board, or placard, upon any footway, except for the purpose of loading or unloading any cart or carriage, or of crossing the footway. 7. Every person who, after being made acquainted with the regulations or directions which the Commissioners of Police shall have made for regulating the route of horses, carts, carriages and persons during the time of divine service, and for preventing obstructions during public processions and other occasions hereinbefore specified, shall wilfully disregard or not conform himself thereto. 8. Every person who shall sell or distribute, or offer for sale or distribution, or exhibit to public view any profane, indecent, or obscene book, paper, print, drawing, painting, or representation, or sing any profane, indecent, or obscene song or ballad, or write or draw any indecent or obscene word, figure, or representation, or use any profane, indecent, or obscene language to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers. 10. Every person who shall use any threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned. 11. Every person, except the guards and postmen belonging to Her Majesty's post office in the performance of their duty, who shall blow any horn or use any other noisy instrument, for the purpose of calling persons together, or of announcing any show or entertainment, or for the purpose of hawking, selling, distributing, or collecting any article whatsoever, or of obtaining money or alms. 12. Every person who wantonly discharge any fire-arms, or throw or discharge any stone or other missile, or the damage or danger of any person, or make any bonfire, or throw or set fire to any fire-work. 13. Every person who shall fly any kite, or play at any game, to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers, or who shall make or use any slide upon ice or snow in any street or other thoroughfare, to the common danger of the passengers. And it shall be lawful for any constable belonging to the metropolitan police force to take into custody, without warrant, any person who shall commit any such offence without risk of any such constable.—End.

THE STATE OF IRELAND.—We have great pleasure in publishing a letter, descriptive of the impressions of a visit to Ireland after ten years' absence, by Mr. William Chambers, of Edinburgh. Mr. Chambers is one of the brother-conductors of the well-known and popular periodical, and author of a Tour in Holland and Belgium, reviewed in the Spectator about two months since. The powers of close observation and disinterested judgment exhibited in that Tour induce us to place full reliance on the gratifying statements of Irish progress contained in this letter.

Edinburgh, 19th August, 1839.

DEAR SIR,—Since I saw you in London, I have made a pretty considerable round, by way of Dublin and Belfast, to Edinburgh; but how rapidly is such a journey now made!—from London to Liverpool by railway, ten hours; Liverpool to Kingston twelve hours; Kingston to Dublin by railway, a quarter of an hour—all steam. What a marvel is this steam, now-a-days! It is doing more for Ireland in the way of moral and physical improvement in one day than was effected in years by the rubbish of Parliamentary enactments. People in England, however, are not aware of this; they go on dreaming about upstarts, civil wars, and miseries which characterized a past age in Ireland, apparently unaware that the Ireland of 1839 is quite a different thing from the Ireland of 1790, or even of 1828. I had not been in Ireland for ten years, and was on this occasion much struck with the signals of improvement which on all sides presented themselves. Dublin more cleanly and infinitely more orderly, than it used to be. It has got a police, dressed in the same garb and disciplined in the same manner as that in the metropolis. This civil force, has, I understand, been of prodigious benefit to Dublin; every thing like a riot is now promptly quelled, and during the night all is as quiet and peaceful as in London. There is, I think, also much less of that tag-rag and broken-windowedness in the appearance of some of the by-streets than I saw formerly,—as if a taste for neatness and love of comfort were on the increase. Those funny fellows who drive the street-cars are likewise more decent in their apparel—the straw rope having disappeared from the cart and the screaming being a good deal of a better order. The railway to Kingston is now going on favourably after some initiatory difficulties. The train goes every half-hour. I went several times to and fro, and there were never fewer than from a hundred to two hundred persons carried. In consequence of the ease of conveyance out of town in this direction, the beautiful long sloping hills along the entrance to the Bay are becoming covered with villas, the whole presenting a scene of great beauty from the sea. While the envier is thus receiving the higher class of householders from the city, the streets they leave partially deserted are filling up with shops and houses of business, thus affording an evidence of growing prosperity. I was pleased to observe, among other tokens of improvement, an increase of bookshops: shops of these are even numerous, and I learned that literature is daily advancing. A few years ago, there was no publishing at all; but now, one house, Curry and Company, issues as many new books, the produce of native talent, as are issued by all the publishers of Edinburgh, if not considerably more.

When I was last in Dublin, (in 1828,) I was astonished to see the vast number of red coats in the streets; but now there is hardly one to be seen. From whatever causes, this is doubtless a good sign of the state of affairs: there is always something wrong when red is a predominating colour in apparel.

The thing, however, which pleased me most, was the appearance of the schools for the children of the poorer classes. At the school of the National Board of Education, I saw 1,700 children, a mixture of Roman Catholics and Protestants, receiving an education infinitely superior in quality to that given in our Scottish parish-schools. I found not only new reading taught, but mathematics and natural sciences. A class of very poor, old, and infirm, at my request, went through all the syllabus in these branches of knowledge; and the result was most satisfactory. (School-fee 1d. per week.) I visited also the large school of the Kildare Place Society, and found in it, 1,100 children under a similar system of tuition. From these visits, and what I saw otherwise I feel impressed with the belief that the Irish have got fairly into the right course of intellectual and moral advancement, and that the country will by and by show as good a front as England or Scotland. One thing is most gratifying—the landed proprietors have begun to take an interest in the condition of the poor peasantry. The Poor-law deserves the credit of bringing about this beneficial change in public sentiment. Foreseeing that the peasantry may fall upon them for subsistence, already a stir has been created among the gentry, and they are at this moment, in diverse places, projecting some wholesome measures of emigration, and making an effort to enlarge the size of farms, and introduce agricultural improvements. All this is exactly as it should be. The mischief of Ireland is too many people and too little work; and although the country will ultimately support in comfort far more than its present number of inhabitants, it is clear, that in the mean-time the prodigious mass of labourers must be removed—that is, in the spirit of kindness, sent away to regions where labourers are wanted and well paid. It is likely enough that a class of orators, newspapers, and vagabonds, who thrive upon keeping up mischief, may set their face against these benevolent plans of emigration; but I would fain hope that, by good management, Ireland will be relieved of her difficulties, and the land every where put under a right system of agriculture. Already, I understand, estates are bringing good prices; and no wonder, seeing that produce of every description is so readily exported to England and Scotland by steam-boats. Cattle, pork, poultry, butter, and vegetables are now sent off daily for half-a-dozen ports, and,—would you believe it?—Glasgow is now supplied with buttermilk from Belfast. Of course, all this is rapidly transplanting capital from Great Britain to Ireland; and hence Ireland must thrive in spite of herself. Every one with whom I conversed allowed, that provided no political squabble intervened, all that Ireland was fairly treated as an integral portion of the United Kingdom, its advance in the course of the next ten years, would be very considerable. I have no doubt in my own mind, that in that period there will be a decided rush of capital into Ireland—the rush, indeed, has begun. That half a century, however, may elapse before it is what it ought to be, is not improbable; for Scotland took nearly a century to recover from the shock of its Union—all its improvements, as you know, being of quite a recent date. Among other symptoms of an advance, I found that the Church is roused to do something useful. There is now a greater energy about the clergy; and they are at present projecting the establishment of schools of a strictly Protestant kind. This is excellent. The more schools the better; for the greater chance is there of the whole people being educated.

In the North I found things in a fully more flourishing state than in the South. A railway, just opened, from Belfast to Limerick, is making a stir. It is to be carried shortly to Arragh, afterwards, I believe, to Drogheda and Dublin. When we get our railway from Edinburgh to Glasgow finished, and also the railway from Glasgow to Greenock, we shall be able to reach Ireland from the east coast of Scotland in no time.

I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

W. CHAMBERS.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON.—Mr. Hume presented a petition to the following effect from T. Steele, Esq., a native of Ireland, a member of the senate of the University of Cambridge. The petition stated "That at a very short distance from Tyndale-square, and close behind the houses in the centre of the south side of Leicester-square, stands the house of Newton, with his observatory upon its summit—a small room about ten feet square—the house and observatory of him of whom it has been most truly written, 'the scientific character of Newton is the glory of England.' They are going rapidly to decay, and in some years must cease to have existence, unless some measures be taken to secure their preservation. Your petitioner, therefore, presumed to suggest that they should be purchased, provided the purchase could be made on reasonable terms; and when they should become the property of the British empire, that they should be put in the most perfect state of repair which architectural skill can devise, to insure their preservation for some ages longer, as a source of eternal exultation to mankind in the capital of England. A marble statue of Newton, sitting in inspiration, and exquisitely executed, should then be placed in the observatory, in which while he was alive he was accustomed to view the heavens and to be inspired. The expense by which this most interesting relic might be preserved, would be to the empire utterly inconsiderable."—Pat.

EFFICACY OF BLEEDING A DEAD MAN.—At an inquest held on Tuesday, before Mr. Carter, on the body of a man who died suddenly, a juror asked the surgeon if he had attempted to bleed the man. The surgeon said he did not, as he was quite dead. Juror.—But surely you might have tried to bleed him; if you failed the case would be no worse; you could not hurt the man if he was dead. Witness.—Certainly not; but it would have been useless, as the deceased was dead full ten minutes before I saw him. Juror.—Why, Sir, I was dead, at least to all appearance, for a full hour; but the surgeon who was called in tried to bleed me, and succeeded, and here I am a living proof of the benefit of using the lancet. [With surgeons would use it more frequently in such cases.—Ibid.]

BARNETTS.—From a return, printed by order of the House of Commons (No. 443), of the number of flats in bankruptcy issued from January 1, 1838, to January 1, 1839, it appears that the London flats amounted to 306; and the country flats to 781; making a total of 1,087. The highest country list was that of Manchester, 82; Birmingham, 54; Liverpool, 44; Leeds, 33.—Ibid.

BIRTHS AT SEA.—On the 4th of July, when the ship Robert Pultford, Captain John Prince, lately arrived at Baltimore, from Liverpool, was in lat. 36 deg. long. 73 deg. the wife of Mr. Lewis Lewis, one of the passengers, gave safely delivered of three fine daughters. They were severally named Colombia, Oceana, and Victoria. The mother and children are doing well.—Ibid.

STATUE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.—A statue of Sir Walter, by Mr. Ritchie, was on the 15th instant set up at Selkirk. The statue (7½ feet high) is a striking likeness of the poet. Sir Walter is in the costume of the Sheriff, in his gown, with a roll of papers in his right hand, his right hand resting on his trusty staff. The following is the inscription under the statue:—

"Erected in August, 1839, in proud and affectionate remembrance of Sir Walter Scott, Bart., Sheriff of this county from 1800 to 1832.

"By Yarrow's stream still let me stray,
Though none should guide my weary way;
Still feel the breeze down Ettrick break,
Though it should chill my withered cheeks."

—On the several sides of the pedestal are Sir Walter's arms—the arms of the burgh—on other compartments are emblematical allusions to the character of the poet and novelist—a winged harp, with the word "Waverley" under it, and a finely cut Scotch thistle on another panel.—Christ. Adv.

OPENING OF THE VERBALEUIL RAILWAY.—This railway branches off from that of Paris to St. Germain, and passes through a rocky and troublesome country. On the 27th of April, 1837, the law was passed authorizing Messrs. Rothschild to execute it; and on the 4th inst. it was opened, having taken not more than two years and three quarters for its completion. It was originally intended to have had an independent entrance into Paris, but by an agreement with the St. Germain Railway, the two lines have been united, so as to have a common depot. The line seems efficiently constructed, and the rails well laid, and the locomotives perform their duty satisfactorily. They are of English make, and were manufactured by Messrs. Sharpus, of Manchester; the working engineers are also English. At an early hour in the morning the line was beset with a great crowd, awaiting the opening of the doors, and in the course of the day it was calculated that fifteen thousand persons were carried, valuing above forty thousand francs, or about sixteen hundred pounds. A great crowd was attracted, not only from Paris, but from the neighbouring towns, to witness the ceremony of the inauguration.—Pat.

HANOVER, August 18.—At Court all is very still. The King was indisposed for some days; but though he was obliged to have medical advice, he did not omit to ride out every day as usual. His Majesty avails every thing that might make a change in his extremely regular plain way of life, and his constitution is accordingly vigorous, notwithstanding his advanced age. The Queen is often ill, and is now rather severely indisposed. As the Court expects, in the next fortnight, the return of the Duke of Alenburgh, who will stay here some time with his family, it seems that their Majesties will not undertake any journey this summer; but the King will perhaps go to Frankfort to escort his august slater. The proceedings against the magistrates go on very slowly; all the members, including the senators, have been examined but one. The address of thanks from the town of Linburg to the Magistrates of Hanover surpasses all the preceding ones in the richness of its expressions.—Ibid.

SARATOW, JULY 10.—In the night of the 18th of June, the inhabitants of the village of Fedorowk were awakened by subterranean noise and a sort of earthquake, which gave a violent shock to all their dwellings. Important of the cause of this terrible shock they hastened into the streets, and saw, to their terror, that the whole valley, in which most of the houses are situated, had become loosened from the foot of the mountain, that it had sunk considerably, and was advancing towards the Wolga. The terror of these poor people was extreme when they saw the whole mass was moving, and that some of their houses were towed up, while some sank down. In a short time there were formed on this sunken surface elevations and depressions, and broad and very regular cracks, which gave it the appearance of a terrace; where there had been marshes or small lakes hills had arisen, and the elevated spot had become hollow, filled with water as well as the cracks. The undulating motion of the ground continued for 73 hours, after which it gradually ceased. More than 70 houses are damaged, some are totally destroyed, and almost all the cellars are filled up. The fields and kitchen-gardens, which were nearest to the mountain and considerably higher up than the village, have suffered most of all. Happily no persons have perished. During the confusion the peasants all lived in the open air; they are now beginning to repair their houses. The sinking of the valley is one mile and a half long and 250 fathoms broad; it is not yet known how far the valley has moved forward.—Ibid.

ALGIERE.—The Toulonnais, of the 18th Aug., contains intelligence from Algiers, of the 6th, at which period the heat continued to be intense along the African coast. The French troops consequently suffered much from illness. At Philippeville, on the 5th, there were no fewer than 500 sick in the hospital; but although 14 died in one day, the mortality was comparatively inconsiderable. The engineers had been in some degree obliged to suspend their work, from the want of men. The road between that town and Constantine is protected by five camps; travelling is, nevertheless, not altogether secure. The Arabs, who have collected in their harvest, occasionally take the field and indulge in an old fantasy against parties journeying without escort. The French, it appears, had judged the position of Setif untenable, and evacuated the country during the night, leaving El Mokral, the Califa of their own army, to shift for himself. The latter, however, finding it impossible to maintain himself without their aid, soon followed them, and the Medjana was quietly retaken possession of by Abd-el-Salm, the real Shick of the country. Achmet Bey was still within three or four days' journey of Constantine, on the frontier of Tunis, from which he had lately opened a correspondence with the Government of that city.—Ibid.

Fort William, the 18th November, 1839.

No. 106 of 1839.—The Honourable the President in Council having taken into consideration, as a general question, the terms upon which officers proceeding on duty, or on account of sickness, on board Government Troop Ships, or Government Vessels of any kind when used as Troop Ships, or of Transports hired by Government, ought to be merced at the Captain's Table, or if the Vessel be a Ship of War, of the East India Company, in the Wardroom, has resolved, that the rate for a Subaltern shall not exceed (4) Four Rupees per diem, and for a Captain or Superior officer (5) Five Rupees. It shall be incumbent therefore on the Masters or Commanders of Vessels employed as Troop Ships or Transports, to provide such a Table as the rates stated may afford, under the Control of the Marine Board or Head of Department through whom the Vessel is engaged or superintended.

The rates above laid down are intended to be in modification of the previously established rate of (6) Eight Rupees per diem, of which six Rupees were made payable by Government and Two by the officer commanding. It is to be considered necessary to entitle the rates of Passage and Table Money for the Wives and Children of officers, which may continue as heretofore adjusted in accordance with established custom.

It is to be understood that the above rates provide only for the Table Allowance without Wines, for which the Commandant may have his Separate Charges, or the officers may make their own provision.

When officers are ordered to proceed on Service on board Ship, the Government will pay the Table allowance at the rate stated. Officers proceeding to Sea, under circumstances which do not entitle them to have their Table Money paid by Government, will be entitled to be received and messed on board of any Government or hired Vessel employed on Transport Service, at the rates specified, which will be realised through the Marine Board or Head of Department.

The above Rules, however, will have no application to cases of officers taking their passage on their private account otherwise than in the course of Service, nor to other than Military Persons when provided with passage and accommodation on board of Government or hired Vessels. Such officers returning from Service will have to pay their own Table Money.

The President in Council directs that these Rules shall be made applicable to Government Steamers at Bombay, as well as to those belonging to the Port of Calcutta, whenever these Vessels are used as Transports, or for the conveyance of Troops and officers on Service.

No. 107 of 1839.—In continuation of General Orders No. 154, of the 21st October 1839, the Honourable the President in Council has pleased to transfer Ensign Frederick James Thompson, from the 27th Regiment Native Infantry, to be 6th Ensign in the 2d European Regiment.

The undermentioned Gentlemen are a ballot to the Service, in conformity with their appointments by the Honourable the Court of Directors, as Captains or Lieutenants on this Establishment, and presented to the rank of Ensign leaving the date of their Commission for future appointment :

- Mr. Robert Bruce Norton, ..... Date of arrival at Fort William.
- " Thomas Whitaker Seager, ..... 14th November, 1839.
- " Richard Henry Gennys, ..... 14th November, 1839.
- " William Wright Aubert, ..... 14th November, 1839.
- " Thomas H. Green, ..... 14th November, 1839.

The following officers have returned to their duty on this Establishment, without prejudice to their rank, by permission of the Honourable the Court of Directors :

THE LANDHOLDERS' SOCIETY.—A special meeting of this Society is convened for Saturday next, to consummate an act of fraternization with the British India Society, recently established in London. The object of this arrangement is to secure the co-operation of that body, and its widely diffused agency, in promoting the views of the Landholders among the community of England. And as the primary design of the Calcutta Society is to defeat the measures of Government, in the resumption of rent-free tenures, which are found to be rotten, we are, perhaps, not far from the truth, when we suppose, that the battle of Resumptions is now to be transferred from Calcutta to London. It will not be surprising if we should find the eloquence of George Thompson, and the sarcasm of Lord Brougham, employed in support of a system of unequal, and, therefore, unjust taxation. The paper which Mr. Mangles has drawn up, during his voyage to England, in which the modesty and the merits of the demand made by the rent-free holders will, doubtless, be placed in the clearest light, will, therefore, be published exactly at the juncture when it is likely to be most useful in counteracting delusion.

The alliance between a Society in India, raised up to protect local interests, and a Society in London, established to obtain 'justice for India,' might have appeared in other circumstances a subject of congratulation. But when we examine the views adopted at home, and the interests represented here by the respective bodies, the ardour of hope is not a little diminished. The London Society is founded, doubtless, upon the purest principles, by men of exalted sentiments; but it has, at the very outset, adopted such partial and extreme opinions, as cannot fail to diminish both its strength and utility. It has manifested a disposition to receive and disseminate every charge against the Government of India, however preposterous,—and what can be more preposterous than the charge of having occasioned famines? It has shewn no disposition to view with complacency, or to improve those benefits which the British Government may even accidentally have bestowed on the country. All the speeches delivered at its meetings, which we have yet seen, run in the strain of Lamela, when he took upon him the office of Inquisitor, in the case of Maitre Simon. "Mon ami, reprit Lamela, vous oubliez qu'il ne faut point dans votre interrogatoire excuser Samuel Simon; je tiens en ai dit les conséquences. Vous ne devez dire que des choses qui soient contre lui, et pas un mot en sa faveur." It is possible that in time that Society may find it necessary, even for its own reputation, to adopt more impartial sentiments, and to manifest justice to the Government of India, as well as compassion to its inhabitants; but at present, it is a very unsafe guide to the truth; though admirably adapted as a receptacle for the resentments of the Native Landholders. The Landholder's Society, on the other hand, represents but one local interest; and that, the interest of the strong, and not the weak. Our readers need not be told that the Zemindary Institution, as a distinct and recognized order in the State, was created in the year 1793, by Lord Cornwallis, who raised the Native Collectors of rent into Lords of the Soil. It has been a matter of constant regret since that period, that the Governor General made no adequate provision for the protection of the peasantry. There can be little question, that their condition has been gradually and steadily deteriorated since the permanent settlement, and that the poor are kept perpetually on the verge of starvation. For one complaint which the Zemindars may have against Government, the Ryot has a score to prefer against his Zemindar. Of the former, the British India Society is likely to obtain a very large number; of the latter, we fear none. As the Landholder's Society will be considered in the light of an ally, a valuable ally in the crusade against the Government of India, which the British India Society has commenced, it is not likely that the oppression which is chargeable upon the great majority of that community will reach the ears of this Association; or will obtain a favourable hearing, if, by any accident, it should find its way to England. We do not deny that there is much, very much which demands correction in the system of Government; but there is still more room for improvement in the conduct of the middle men, who stand between the tiller of the land and the State. The wide spread misery of the peasantry is more to be attributed to the oppressions of the Zemindary Officers, than to those of Government.

We published an able letter from Cassanese on the 21st of last month, on the subject of the Landholder's Society, in which he depicted, in lively colours, the risk to which the Government of India was likely to be exposed, by the establishment of a metropolitan association, the sole object of which had reference to the main element of Indian revenue, if it was allowed to remain unbalanced by provincial unions. It becomes Government, we think, to watch narrowly the progress of circumstances, and to stand prepared for the appearance, at no distant period,—we speak only in the future tense,—of a nucleus of opposition in the metropolis, composed of wealthy Zemindars, governed by an oligarchy, European and Native, with nothing for a bond of union, but a mistrust of the public authorities, which will easily ripen into hatred, and affiliated with the Society at home, which the presumed delinquency of Government alone has called into existence. Should such a state of things ever arise, the management of public affairs in this country, for the benefit of general interests, will become difficult. Misrepresentations will be sent home, and eagerly caught up and disseminated through the organization of the British India Society, and speedily become the staple of public opinion respecting the British Government in India. The force of popular opinion, collected and directed by able agents at home, is not to be despised. It was the Parliament out of doors,—the Parliament of the Press and the Platform,—that new element in our constitution, which wrested the emancipation of the slaves from the unwilling Peers and Commons of England. On that occasion, we acknowledge equally the benevolence and the omnipotence of the Interposition. But it cannot be denied, that it was by presenting one object of intense hatred to the people of England, in the slave owners of the West Indies, that the popular sympathies were aroused.

The same sensibilities may be aroused against the Government of India by the same organization; and we would venture to warn the public authorities to prepare for the possibility of such a crisis. First, by a vigorous reform of all abuses, so that when the day of trial comes, it may be able to court every man in its conduct with scrupulousness, by giving the Zemindars in the country the same advantages which are exclusively enjoyed by those in the metropolis, by a general system of education, more especially in the vernacular languages; by encouraging local associations; by creating municipalities; by reuniting the country, and giving it a voice which shall be heard and felt. There is an inherent tendency in every metropolitan association, secular or religious, to make itself the sole channel of influences, and to draw all provincial power to itself. It is this spirit that must be counteracted by a series of comprehensive measures, which shall embrace the regeneration of the country.

We cannot close this article without disclaiming, in the most distinct form, any hostility to the Landholders or the British India Society. We think both are capable of being instruments of much good; but they may do harm. We look with confidence, however, to the meeting of Saturday. We have no doubt that with the leading members of the Landholder's Society embracing the offer of alliance, which has been made to them, the rhetorical misrepresentations which have been put forth by the members of the London Society, will be repelled, and a permanent and the Calcutta Association will come forward fully and declare that the union is conditional on the adoption of a juster view of things, and a more exact and present state of facts.

EDUCATION IN THE COOLY COUNTRY.—Our intelligent and public spirited Correspondent, Baboo Taruknath Sen, indulged us with a copy of his letter, which has been sent to all our Correspondents, in the hope of its first appearing in the pages of each of us, his equally ardent and studied Journalists. As the letter has appeared in all the daily papers, it is unnecessary we also should print it; but we are truly happy to direct attention to its subject. The Baboo reports that Government, or, we suppose, the Education Committee, has sanctioned an allowance of 275 Rupees a month, for two schools amongst the Coles; the one at Chota Nagpore, and the other at Singhbhum. The schools are yet in their infancy; but they have accomplished one good service. They have brought out proof that the Coles are capable of learning English. Of course they could not have been susceptible of such an acquisition, had they not possessed native good sense and ability. It must be remembered, however, that these are the Hill people, the Dhangars, said by Mr. Arbuthnot to be the first remove from monkeys; for we were required to believe, it was making men of them, to turn them into Dhangars. But here is the truth—they are capable of comprehending and using the English language. We wonder what proportion of the Cooly merchants would shew equal ability in acquiring the language of the Coles, even though it must be a vastly more simple affair.

It has also been represented, that the Native home of these tribes was such, that it was a charity to convey them to the more fruitful and genial regions of the Mauritius and the West Indies. But a Correspondent in the Englishman of Thursday last, draws a very different picture. Chota Nagpore, he says, furnishes a lofty table land about 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. The scenery, in most parts of the district, is extremely beautiful. Abundant Dyrrunda, and for forty miles west of that station, there is little or no jungle; but on the contrary, a beautiful, undulating, well-cultivated country, with numerous streams of water intersecting it. Even in the hot season, the heat is seldom very oppressive, and the mornings and evenings are uniformly cool. In the cold season, from October to March, no climate can be more salubrious and bracing. Steady N. West winds blow during nearly the whole of this period; no dull fogs obscure the horizon, and the sun's rays are rather sought, than avoided. Such diseases as fever, cholera, dysentery and spleen are scarcely known. It is a land of coal, lime and iron. European fruits and vegetables thrive in it; orange trees produce abundantly, and so do coffee plants. In fact it is a country of natural wealth; and its inhabitants are a willing, good tempered, sociable race, with scarcely any vice but that of drunkenness.

Is there any paradise of slavery to be followed with the native hills and valleys of these poor people? All they need for their temporal comfort is, that attention should be directed to their land, and assistance and instruction afforded them in drawing out its riches. And we would fain hope, that Government will see the importance of making a liberal grant for the establishment of schools amongst them. The multiplication of English Schools would be folly. The elements of knowledge are wanted in the most easy and intelligible form; and the wide diffusion of these should precede the costly attempt to give refined education to a favoured few. If Government will do nothing in this work, something might be done by public liberality. Indeed, the parsimony of Government in education, and the bigotry of the Education Committee in respect of the English language as the medium of instruction, and their antipathy to religion, if persisted in, must bring the real lovers of India to renounce all interest in their educational proceedings, and take up the work independently of them, throughout the country. In that case, we can scarcely fancy any portion of our population having greater claims upon public sympathy than the Coles. And if the British India Society, and any branches of it that may be organized in this country, were to let alone their declamations about things that cannot be helped, and give their assistance in healing the social disorders of our people, by an enlightened system of education, enunciating the principles of true religion and morality, respecting which they would be hampered by no such reptilians as Government, they would put a different face upon our prospects.

In the meantime we shall feel obliged to our worthy friend Taruknath, for more information about the people of Chota Nagpore, and the schools. Why is it that a Hindoo teacher is appointed to each of the schools? As the district borders immediately upon Beerbloom, Burdwan and Midnapore, we should have thought that the Bengalees would have been more familiar, and also more useful, to the Coles, than the Hindus. But has nothing been done for the cultivation of the language of the people themselves; and is not their own tongue to be adopted as the great medium of instruction?

Respecting the district itself, we should like to have a distinct outline of its boundaries, and its natural features; the number of divisions into which it is partitioned, for the judicial and revenue administration, with the public officers in charge of them; the population of each division, with the varieties of name and language prevailing amongst them, the nature of their agricultural produce, and the different industrious occupations in which they are engaged; the tenure by which they hold their lands; the amount of revenue collected in the district, and the mode of its assessment; and also the expenses of the local administration. If our Correspondent will have the goodness to inform us on these points, we shall gratify him by another string of inquiries.

Before leaving the subject, we would ask the Conductors of our Missionary Societies, where they could find a more inviting field than the Cole country presents? Its inhabitants are as unsophisticated a race as are to be seen in any of the islands of the Pacific; and yet it is within the bounds of the civilized world, and under the safe keeping of British authority.

ASSOCIATION OF PLANTERS.—A proposal is now in circulation in Calcutta for the establishment of an Indigo Planter's Association, the object of which is described in the following notice:

"The undersigned Indigo Planters and others connected with the cultivation of Indigo, propose holding a meeting at the Town Hall for the purpose of instituting a society to be called the Indigo Planter's Association. It is perhaps unnecessary in this place to do more than state that the object of the proposed association is to watch over and protect the interests of the Planters, as a body, in the same manner as the Chamber of Commerce, and the Trade Association do those of the respective bodies they represent."

It is somewhat singular that no mention should be made of the Landholder's Association, while so distinct an allusion is made to the Chamber of Commerce, and the Trade Association, as the institutions which have suggested the expediency of a similar union on the part of the Planters. As both these associations have been in existence for several years, we naturally conclude that some more proximate cause must have called this new Society into existence. It is not difficult to perceive that this cause has arisen from the establishment of the Landholder's Society, which is supposed to be daily gathering strength, and is now seeking to extend its influence by alliance with the British India Society. It was time, therefore, for the Planters to look about them for some means of consolidating and protecting their own interests. The interests of the Planters and Zemindars are not only distinct, but opposite. In the natural order of things, this would appear surprising, for the large local expenditure of the Planters cannot but have the effect of improving the value of land around them, and, therefore, of making their presence desirable to those who enjoy the rent; but, in reality, the Zemindars, with few exceptions, entertain a most cordial jealousy of the Planters, and consider the existence of an Indigo Factory in their neighbourhood as a most disastrous event. So strong is the mistrust which these two classes entertain towards each other, that it has led to the engagement on either side of large bodies of club men, for mutual defence; and to those frequent outrages, perpetrated almost under the eye of the Government, which are so disgraceful to the character of our rule. We think that under existing circumstances, the Planters are much to be commended for their prudence in seeking to protect their interests by union and organization, though it is much to be desired that the British Government could be led to adopt such a reform in the Magistracy, as should, by its justness, vigour and efficiency, extinguish these unhappy feuds and collisions.

One of the greatest blessings which such an association might be expected to produce, would be the extinction of that discord between Planter and Planter, which arises from mutual encroachment, and too often ends in a disturbance of the peace. But we do not see at present how the proposed union can effect so desirable an object. The Chamber of Commerce has its Committee of Arbitration, which serves the Supreme Court a world of trouble, and saves the merchants a mint of money. But no such general Committee can be established among the Planters. The merchants are collected in one city, and may meet, settle a dispute, and disperse in an hour or two. The Planters are separated from each other, even in the same district, by many miles, and no arbitration can be satisfactory, without a local investigation. It is scarcely to be expected that Planters will be prepared to sacrifice their own interest, often at the period of the year in which even moments are of value, by quitting the scene of their own labours, to settle the disputes of their neighbours. Yet it is a very desirable object, both for the general character of the Planters, and for the peace and welfare of society; and if the Association should effect no other reform, than the extinction of these hostilities, it would be a real blessing. As, however, these border frays occur most frequently where the Factories are thickly congregated, and the competition for lands is great, perhaps it would not be altogether impossible to appoint a Committee of Arbitration in each of the largest Indigo districts, who might proceed to the spot, in a short space of time, and arbitrate between the contending parties. We hope that before the plan is submitted for public approval, a very distinct provision will be made for this arbitration of disputes, as far as it may be practicable.

VELOCITY OF THE FRIEND.—Some time since the Hurkara, in reference to a letter which we published without comment, containing sentiments different from our own, maintained that when an Editor abstained from any refutation of the sentiments of his Correspondents, he must be held to have adopted them as his own. We pointed out the inconvenience of this Editorial law at the time, and have now an opportunity of confirming our views from the columns of our Contemporary. On Saturday last the Hurkara published a letter, signed "Homo," in which the FRIEND is directly charged with having been bought by Government. This assertion, than which nothing can be more unfounded, appeared, without contradiction, in the Hurkara; and that paper is, therefore, chargeable, upon its own doctrine, with having knowingly and willingly, and of malice aforethought, published a false and scandalous libel, with the intent of bringing the Friend of India into disrepute. The Hurkara must be fully aware of the fact, of which, however, his Correspondent appears to be ignorant, that it is quite as possible for one Editor to advocate Resumptions, without having been bought over by Government, as for another to denounce them, without having been bribed by the Landholder's Society. Our Contemporary, we are confident, entertains no fear regarding our honesty and independence; and we are bound, therefore, to acquit him of any wish to depreciate our character, by his Editorial silence. He cannot but perceive that there may be many reasons for an Editor's silence, besides his acquiescence in the sentiments of his Correspondents. He may consider them, as, doubtless, the Hurkara did, in the present instance, so preposterous as to refute themselves. He may omit to contradict them from inadvertence, or hurry, or want of leisure, or even from an indisposition to combat every difference of opinion. We trust, therefore, he will at once eschew the very inconvenient doctrine he has laid down, regarding Editorial responsibility, if not for our sakes, at least for his own.

We have looked carefully into the very hard case brought forward by the Correspondent of the Hurkara, similar to which, it is said, that "hundreds and thousands exist;" and are unable to discover that it involves any very particular severity or injustice. A Native Zemindar holds 72 khadas; that is, 1152 bighas of land, for which he pays a rent of 115 Rupees a year to Government. Were this the assessment of the entire estate, it would be at the rate of one anna eight pie the bighah. No land is assessed so low; and, therefore, the prima facie conclusion is, that the largest portion of this land is held upon a rent-free tenure. The Deputy Collector maintains that 33 khawas, or 813 beegahs are thus held, and he has subjected the tenure to examination. If the tenure be eventually decreed to be unsound, there will be left to the Zemindar 304 beegahs, to enable him to pay an assessment of 115 Rupees, or about six annas a beegah. This, of itself, can be no great hardship, for this scale of rent would be found not to be above the average of assessment throughout the district. The land that may be resumed, moreover, will, probably, be given to him at a lower rent than other ground.

Then, as to the actual pecuniary loss which the Zemindar asserts he has sustained in a litigation of four years, the Correspondent states, that the items are bona fide drawn from the man's books; and we are, therefore, to infer, that these books have been actually inspected by the European. The Zemindar has entered the probable amount of his legal earnings, if he had continued to practise at the Moonsiff's Court, for forty-eight months, at fifteen Rupees a month—720 Rupees as an expenditure! It appears singularly strange, that while he employed a legal agent, as he says, at an expense of 114 Rupees to conduct his suit, he should, at the same time, have abandoned his own means of subsistence. Such is not the usual practice of Natives, and the Correspondent has drawn rather a long bow when he affirms "that hundreds, if not thousands, of such cases exist." Be that as it may; we will venture to assert, that this is the first instance in which a Native has put down in his books of exp. uitire the sum which he might have earned by his practice in four years. We suspect that "Hono" is given to lawyers; and that his credulity on the hardship of the Resumptions, has got wind among his neighbours. Far be it from us to deny, that the Resumptions will and must occasion hardship. All restoration of property, which may have been surreptitiously obtained, must be hard and unpalatable. So must the perpetual loss of it be to those who are legitimately entitled to it. If the Resumptions are abandoned, it will be a hardship to Government to lose a million sterling of the ancient indefeasible resources of the State. If they be carried into effect, the hardship will be shifted to those who are called to relinquish lands, of which they have held possession, for a series of years. On both sides are hardships. We wish them, then, to be fairly and equitably divided between the parties, and an adjustment of these claims to be effected by a perpetual under-assessment of all rent-free tenures. All great and salutary measures are effected by compromise.

EDUCATION OF THE CIVIL SERVICE.—A notice has appeared in the papers of this Presidency, during the past week, of the intentions of the Court of Directors, regarding the acquisition of Oriental languages by the students at Haylebury. It is asserted to be their intention to limit the studies of those who are intended for this Presidency, to the Sanskrit and the Persian languages. There is something so preposterous in this arrangement, that we can scarcely believe that any intention exists of carrying it into effect. It seems marvellous that, after the Bengal Government had adopted the Bengalee language, as the medium of transacting public business, the Court of Directors should not allow that language to be studied at their initiatory College at home. It seems still more strange that they should insist upon the study of Sanskrit, the most difficult language under the sun, and a dead language, which can be of no practical use among a living people. It seems strange, that after Persian had been universally discarded from all the Courts, it should continue to be patronized at home; and that the only preparation which the Courts design for a Civil Servant, to fit him for the discharge of his duties here, is the acquisition of languages which he will have no occasion to use on his arrival. There is something so silly in this kind of opposition to the local arrangements, that we are disposed to consider the intelligence as altogether groundless. If the Directors disapprove of the change of language, the most honourable line of conduct would be, to order the Persian to be at once restored; Lord Auckland must and would obey; but to allow of its expulsion from India, and yet to train up their servants in a knowledge of it, is unmanly and anomalous.

But of what use is the study of Oriental languages in England at all? Is it not an absurd waste of time? A Civilian, of any application, would acquire more of the Native languages in three months in the country itself, and among the people, than he could in a twelvemonth in a foreign land. The season, of all others, the most precious for the acquisition of that knowledge, which is to give character to the man, ought not to be thus frittered away in misplaced studies; which might be compensated with infinitely more efficiency at a subsequent period, and in other scenes. And of what use is Haylebury at all? Would not the Civil Service have been vastly more benefited if it had never existed? We are convinced, that if the College itself were abolished, and if the youth intended for the Service were allowed to complete the circle of a generous education at the ancient and venerable fountains of knowledge; if the last two or three years of their residence in England were passed, not in the exclusive society of a narrow College, in acquiring little learning, and much of an esprit de corps, but in association with the great men by whom our Universities are rendered illustrious, and in a generous contention with those who are destined hereafter to take the lead in the various walks of life, and in the various professions at home, it would prove both an individual and a national blessing.

BYRON ON NATIVE EDUCATION.—(Second Notice.)—Dr. Bryce devotes three chapters, the fourth, fifth and sixth, to a formal exposition of the encouragements, to be drawn from past and present fact and experience, for seeking the education of the Natives of India, and their conversion to the faith of Christ. In the seventh chapter, he treats of the policy of the British Government, as regards the Christian and the Hindoo religion; and, in the eighth chapter, he concludes his volume, with farther encouragement and appeal, in a warm and animated style, which has gratified us much, because of the evidence it affords of the depth of that change which has taken place in his thoughts and feelings respecting Hindoo conversion.

Dr. Bryce draws his encouragements from three sources—the intellectual character of the Hindoos, as indicated by their former progress in philosophy and literature; their moral condition; and the early introduction of Christianity into the country. And, whatever may be thought of his argument, it is certain he has thrown together, in a lively and interesting manner, much that is really valuable, and worthy of being placed distinctly before the Christian world. Availing himself of the labours of our great Orientalists, he has compiled an excellent popular summary of Hindoo literature and science. It is a fair deduction from his statement, that, at least in filling up the history of error, if not in evolving the truths of nature and philosophy, even the learning of Europe may receive important assistance from the ancient literature of India: and the detection of error and the tracing out both of its sources and its issues, are so essential to the establishment of truth, that the two cannot well be separated. Equally fair is the conclusion, that, in attempting to enlighten the Hindoos in a better faith, and instruct them in a better philosophy, "we shall come but half prepared to the task, if we approach it in utter ignorance of the proficiency once made by this singular people, in all the branches of human knowledge, and of the stores of learning, however crude and indigested, which yet exist to mark and demonstrate this proficiency." Whilst we concur with Dr. Bryce in these ideas, we cannot but smile at the following sentence, with which he immediately follows up the statement of them: "This particular path of research has been too little trodden by the Christian Missionary; and it is only now that the mode of instruction, adopted at the Church of Scotland's Institution, is coming into operation, that its full value seems about to be appreciated." This is too bad. In every Mission in India, except that of the Scottish Church, we are familiar with some, at least, of its members, who have been diligent in furnishing themselves for their work, by deep study of Hindoo literature; and the less studious of their colleagues have profited by their research. But in the Scottish Mission, except at Bombay, no oriental scholar has yet been found; and Dr. Duff, to whom otherwise the Mission owes so much, instead of giving the Assembly's Calcutta School such a character as Dr. Bryce would ascribe to it, set his face so sternly against all Hindoo literature, that he took the lead in the vain endeavour to abolish its very alphabets, and that for the express purpose of consigning all its works to extinction, except such fragments as might be thought worthy of being romanized.

There can be no question about the importance of a knowledge of Hindoo literature and philosophy. Indeed, before many years have passed over us, the struggle between Christianity and Hindooism will have come to so close a grapple, that the full comprehension and display of Hindoo doctrine and speculation will be plainly indispensable. But, in the meantime, very different views may be taken of the encouragement to be derived from its existence and character. Most people, we imagine, would feel more encouraged to expect the conversion of the Hindoos, if they were less fortified than they are in their errors, by the abundant resources and defences of "philosophy, falsely so called." Their copious literature is a mass of error to be uprooted, and not a foundation of truth, however low, to be built upon. Not only will much argument be required, sooner or later, to overthrow it; but after argument shall have become unnecessary, the influence of its long sway over the national mind will continue in many subtle forms to embarrass the progress of truth and goodness.

Respecting the moral character and condition of the people of India, Dr. Bryce tries to justify a middle opinion between the partiality of those who have painted the Hindoos "in a mildness, gentleness, and simplicity of manners truly engaging;" and the condemnation of others whose "pencil has been dipped in debauchery, cunning, sensuality, and falsehood, until a picture, the most hideous and revolting, has started into life." The moral depravity of India is a sad subject, on which we would gladly be silent; but as public journalists we are not at liberty always to consult our own feelings. Our conviction is, that those who endeavour to paint the morals of India as fair, or even as moderately bad, write amiably, but in very great ignorance of their subject. The gauge of Indian depravity has never yet been truly taken. The people of India are exceedingly diversified. A vast proportion of them are Mahomedans, (in Bengal, fifteen out of its thirty millions,) and not Hindoos: they live under various climates, some as invigorating as others are enervating; and part of them have been the oppressed and degraded subjects of foreign conquerors, time out of mind, whilst to others war and conquest have been a hereditary occupation from times as ancient. With these diversities, uniformity of character is impossible. The views of one class or province are nearly, if not altogether, wanting in another; and especially the mean and more odious wickedness of the greater part of India is unknown in some parts; where its absence, however, is generally compensated by excesses of a different sort. We believe, too, that there are portions of the country where the character of the people is really generous and pure to a wonderful degree. But of the extent and depth of Native demoralization generally, very few have any adequate conception; and it is a subject on which the truth is not likely to be brought out by the press. Many of the facts are too revolting to be printed; and the task of fixing the character of extreme depravity upon our fellow men is one that most persons will shrink from. One may be excused for preferring, that he should be charged with false testimony in his general opinion of the extravagance of Indian vice, to having his own veracity established by accumulating proof of the depravity of others.

Missionaries are reproached as the revilers of Indian morals. It is said, they feel it in a manner essential to the justification, or at least to the exaltation of their calling, to paint as black as possible the moral delinquency which it is their object to have washed away; and they are frequently spoken of, as if they were actuated by a bitter and fatal antipathy to the people whose salvation they are seeking. Nothing can be more unjust. There is good reason why the opinion of Missionaries, respecting Native morals, should be lower than that of most other writers on the subject. Their standard of comparison is different. Missionaries have the word of God continually in their hands; and whether they are estimating the moral character of Europeans or Natives, they take their measure of it by that holy rule. Were they inquiring whether Bengal or any other country under the sun was the more immoral, it is very probable their conclusion would be, that the difference lay more in variety, than in quantity or intensity of wickedness. But taking Indian morals singly, they can form no other conclusion than that they are bad, bad, bad. In fact it is with Missionaries, when judging of Indian immorality, as with any man when judging himself. As long as a man is living as he lists, without any particular care about the morality or the immorality of his conduct, he has no conception of the strength of evil in himself. His worst opinion of his own character is that he is a merry, shale sonie, sort of fellow, often doing what he should not do, out of mere thoughtlessness, or easy compliance with the ways and wishes of others. But when he seriously sets about declining what is wrong, and doing what is right, he finds that his thoughtlessness and easiness are very different things from what he had imagined. There is in them a waywardness and obstinacy in following what is bad, which betrays an inward depravity, for which at last he cannot choose but hate himself. Now Missionaries are endeavouring to lead the people of India from what is bad to what is good; to find the resistance they see offered to the good, exhibits to them the power of national wickedness, as others have no opportunity of observing it. It is the same case that presented itself to our Lord himself, when he exclaimed, "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil."

But notwithstanding the moral degradation of India, there are many attractive points in the character of its people; and even their worst faults are so clearly to be traced to sources of corruption, to which they have been unhappily exposed, that are enough to have brutalized any men, that it is a hard heart that does not pity, as much as blame their vice. For our own part, we love them much, and find no difficulty in doing so. We are confident, too, that good is in store for them; and that no labour spent on them will be in vain. But their moral condition affords us little or no encouragement. It presents the most powerful incentives to seek their spiritual renovation: but encouragement must be drawn from the potency of the means we use—the gospel of divine grace and truth.

Dr. Bryce's estimate of the change already wrought in the minds of the Natives by Missions generally, or by the Assembly's Institution in particular, is far beyond the truth. Sufficient proof of that was furnished a few months ago. Nevertheless, no trifling change has occurred. The tide is setting in; and by and bye, its flow will be magnificent. It is the nature of the people to move en masse; and their motion will be in the right direction before long.

To the encouragement suggested by the early introduction of Christianity into India, we attach no value whatever. That subject we shall soon have occasion to bring more fully before our readers. In the meantime we would observe, that we have daily before us, instances of modern conversion, not to the name only, but to the power of the gospel, which we hold to be infinitely more pertinent as sources of encouragement, than all that can be drawn from the obscure traditions of antiquity.

The chapter which Dr. Bryce devotes to the policy of the British Government, as regards the Christian and the Hindoo religion, is to the last degree unsatisfactory. It contains some curious information, very plainly shewing that the Government are innocent of having any fixed principle for their guidance on the subject under discussion. On alternate occasions they protest that religion is altogether out of their sphere, and then again interfere with it, of all sorts, and in its minutest concerns. Dr. Bryce appears to be nearly as flexible in these matters as the Honourable Company. He maintains the High Church principle of the obligation of every Government to provide for the religious instruction of its subjects, and then abandons it, and again resumes it with great adroitness, and abundant inconsistency. His general idea is, that the British Government in India is bound naturally to undertake the religious instruction of the people in the Christian faith; but practically they are bound not to do it, by repeated pledges of their own giving, to that effect. Again, de facto, there is an existing precedent for the connection between Church and State, in the countenance and support of idolatry by Government—which it is at once very difficult to justify, and very unwise to destroy; seeing, if it be continued long enough, the time will come when Christian Churches and Ministers may be neatly slipped in to the place of the Hindoo temples and brahmins, without noise or disturbance. If the Government would take Dr. Bryce's advice, they would keep nodding on towards that result, by gradually extending their ecclesiastical establishments, (barring the Roman Catholics), and undertaking the support of the Assembly's School and other Institutions of the same evangelical character. It does not appear worth while to combat such notions. But we must say, before leaving the subject, that, however erroneous we conceive Dr. Bryce to be in principle respecting it, there is much practical good sense in many of his conclusions. We are sorry our limits will not allow of our attempting to separate the precious from the vile in his recommendations.

We sincerely regret that our strictures on Dr. Bryce's volume should appear so contentious. But we can safely say our contention is with his writings, and not with himself. His own tone is bland and conciliatory; and his book, with all its faults, does him great credit. It has certainly raised him in our esteem; and we shall look for another volume from him some few years hence, which will place him as much above the position where he now stands, as he is now above what he was in 1824, or even 1814. To close in friendship, we present our readers with the conclusion of Dr. Bryce's appeal on behalf of India, which will speak for itself, and needs no qualification:

"The field, that has now been opened up to us in the East by the events of Providence, is alike vast and in viding beyond the power of language to describe; and never were Christian people placed in a prouder situation, as regards the means of extending a knowledge of the Gospel of Peace. Never was Christian Church called upon, in more commanding language, to send forth the messengers of salvation! Never was presented a higher, or a holier encouragement to those, who are devoting themselves to the Christian ministry. All, that can combine to rouse their energies, or to inspire their labours in His cause, to whose service they are dedicating themselves, is to be found in the field of ISRAEL. Does this field appear to the hasty and indiscriminate observer, a wide and dreary wilderness, too desolate to be cultivated by our limited resources?—No! infinite to be comprehended by our narrow and contracted means? Have we not even already seen the green spots, rising in the desert, that indicate where the well-spring is to be found, by which its drought and its dreariness are to be subdued? Who that has wandered over the jungle-spread plains of Hindostan, and surveyed the ruins, which they display,—the dreary desolation of wilderness, which makes their solitudes so awful; and has not, at the same time, felt, that there was a day, when these wild and dreary places were the seat of a happy and industrious population, 'reveling in the rich fruits of the earth?' The green and fertile spots which, 'few and far between,' at this day surprise and delight the weary traveller,—to what do they owe their life and verdure, but to the labour and capital, which amidst all the desolating revolutions that India has witnessed, still linger behind, in scanty, indeed, yet in sufficient plenty, here and there to reach the rich springs, that still circulate but a little beneath the surface; and which once again spread over the surrounding barrenness, and all would leap into life and vigour?

"Transfer this picture from the natural and physical to the moral and religious canvases, and how strikingly and vividly is the field, which it belongs to the Christian philanthropist to cultivate, placed before his eyes! Here is the wide and dreary wilderness covered by a growth, rank and luxuriant, yet poisonous and destructive: And here is the soil, still giving proof, on every hand, of possessing the choked up and unseen springs, that once overflowed, irrigated, and enlivened it. INDIA cries aloud to Christendom for all, that is to restore this moral wilderness to life, and health, and happiness. The skill, and sympathy she craves are the prayers and alms of a Christian Church and a Christian people, to help her in this day of her poverty and need. Let them not be withheld by us. Let us discharge, with redoubled vigour, the duty which Providence appears so specially to have laid upon us, encouraged by that success, which the same kind Providence has hitherto vouchsafed to our labours. Already is the tree of our own planting beginning to enrich and enliven the desert scene. Like India's own magnificent banyan, the parent stem is now sending down her kindred shoots, to take root in the Native soil. Already these infant props are lending their aid, to sustain the friendly foliage, under which millions of our fellow-creatures will one day be shielded, from the scorching and the withering fire of superstition, which has so long blighted and blasted all their happiness. Even now let us hope, that the SEX OF BROTHERHOOD is arising over the fairest region of the globe, on which the Sun of Nature is destined to shed the light and warmth of his beams."

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 29.

— Mr. Cator, late Registrar at Madras, who has just taken his departure for England, presented 5,000 Rupees, before his departure, to the Vepery School. Including this sum, he has given not less than 15,000 Rupees to that Institution.

— Sir Henry Fane having received intimation of the appointment of Sir Jasper Nicolson, to the office of Commander-in-Chief in India, has signified his determination to resign the office, and its emoluments, on the 1st of January next, keeping with him the General Staff for that period, and thus preventing their joining the Commander-in-Chief for at least two months after he assumes charge of the army. The Orders are abundantly amusing. The Commander orders that the new Commander-in-Chief will be pleased to be at Calcutta on the 1st of January, 1880, to assume the command of H. M. Troops. His Excellency knowing all the while, that Sir Jasper was already in Calcutta, and that he had shewn in his own eyes, that it was not necessary to be in Calcutta to command the Queen's Troop.

— Dost Mahomed's fortunes are said to be in the most deplorable condition. He cannot subvert the few followers that still cling to him, and he has given them their discharge. He is without funds or friends.

— The Bombay Times, in an able article on the general trade of Bombay, states, that nearly five crores and a half of Rupees, five millions and a half sterling, are locked up in Opium.

— Some clue has been found to the robbery of the Lucknow Mail of two lakhs of Rupees, some time ago. A Mr. Smith who returned to India last year, is said to implicate it in it, and has, we hear, been lodged in Jail. He took two of the missing notes to a tradesman in Cossitollah, and obtained change for them, partly in money, partly in goods. He has been living for some time in Serampore, where all his property has been sealed up by the Magistrate.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 29.

— A seasonable fall of rain has depressed the price of grain, and raised public expectation at Cuttack.

— Mr. Henry Douglas, a Civil Servant of sixty years standing, has just died at Patna, at an age bordering on eighty. He has left a fortune of twenty-five lakhs of Rupees.

— Government has reduced the Exchange at which advances will be made on shipments, from 2s. 3d. to 2s. 1d. Unpleasant news to importers from Europe, and glad news to the holders of Bills.

— The Hindustan has begun to republish a review by Mr. William Adams, of the Travels of the Rev. Mr. Malcolm, who was sent out some little time ago to inspect the Missionary stations of the Baptist Convention. Mr. Adams' estimate of Rammoohan Roy's character, written to defend it from the attacks of Mr. Malcolm, is clear and candid, and coming, as it does, from the individual who was best acquainted with the reformer, possesses no little authority.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30.

— A Hindoo, Govind Chunder Gossain, recently died at Balasore, a place consecrated, by the residence of many of the twelve apostles, leaving no fewer than one hundred weeping widows. Another Brahmin of Balasore, lately murdered a young woman with whom he was illicitly connected, one of his friends also, a Brahmin, assisted him in the execution of the deed. They were both committed for trial.

— Another Native paper, called the Raswari, is about to be started, at the low price of 4 annas a month.

— In consideration of the courage displayed by the Native Police in the recent attack of the robbers at Gurreah, Government has been pleased to grant rewards to all the parties engaged, both ryots and officials; the highest reward is 200 Rs. The widow and family of the watchman who fell in the discharge of his duty, are to receive a monthly pension of seven Rupees.

— Government has just advertised, through all the papers, for a Translator to render the Aes into Oriya. There is, we believe, no chance of their finding a competent Translator, beyond the circle of the Missionary's. Where is the Bengalee Translator, for whom Government has now been in search for nearly two years?

— The Governor General, considering the campaign beyond the Indus as closed, by the return of Sir John K. Nance, to the Sikh territories, has publicly offered his thanks to the army for their gallant conduct, and for their prompt subjugation of the rebels. At the same time His Excellency has granted six months' furlough and compensation to all the officers and men who went beyond the Dohar Pass.

— The Management of the Orissa Society have determined to form yet the Comité to Mr. Huttner the intendant of the Press, on his paying a sum of two thousand five hundred Rupees a year.

— It is reported that there has been some skirmishing in the Khyber Pass, between the wild mountaineers and a detachment of English troops, which was employed in escorting provisions.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 2.

— The sons of Sir Andrew met at dinner on Saturday evening at the number, including visitors, of a hundred and twenty. Many appropriate toasts were drunk, and some good speeches were delivered on the occasion.

— It is somewhat singular to find a simultaneous recension of the same subject, for Mr. Macleay's thesis, in both the Hindustan and the Friend of India, is almost identical. The Friend of India attributes to his discovery at St. Andrew's, a man, at which he presided some years ago, and the Hindustan talks of his excellent great discovery.

— The Bishop of Calcutta has left Patna, on his progress up the river, and his first landing, in writing, on account of a heavy shower of rain, set off for the Oude Agent's Mandan, in an Ekka, an instrument of torture, without springs, used by the Native of the country, as a punishment.

— The Bench of Magistrates is engaged in considering the propriety of passing a new Act, amending some of the laws made in the Zemindar or female question, as of Native in Calcutta, who may withhold the Amal.

— The Government of Madras has embraced the opportunity afforded, by the retirement from India of our late Deputy Governor, Colonel Mackenzie, to offer a just tribute of admiration of the abilities and zeal by which the career of that officer was distinguished. In the various high offices which he successively held as a Civil Servant.

— A quantity of British goods has been for the first time, brought forward in the Calcutta market, but yields no higher sum than foreign Rupees a cheap article calculated to freeze the most ardent speculation.

— The Bombay Times has had out a hint, that the Oude Railway is at last going to be put on a more solid basis of the present one.

— A clause from Lord's estate, that the reigning monarch, Nurrukh Sing, though surrounded with all the emblems of royalty, has been deprived of all power by his son, Now Agha, who has assumed all the authority of the State, and proceeded so far as to order that none of his father's orders for the payment of any sum shall be honoured, unless they are counter-signed by him. Great questions are at the same time made on the merchants. It is said that the Royal Treasury derives an income of twenty-four lakhs of Rupees a year, from the excisions on travellers.

— The Bombay Courier states, that the report of Lieut. Pottinger's having been superseded, is groundless, and that he is coming away to live before Lord Auckland the mass of information he has collected at Hehat. Our own letters received this morning from the Camp state, that the supersession of Lieut. Pottinger is defended on the plea, that he is to be appointed to a higher post; but that of the supersession itself there can be no doubt.

— Tatta, in Seinde, has been found to be the City of the Plague. Four hundred and fifty men are laid up in one agglomeration. The idea of selecting it for a permanent cantonment must be abandoned.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3.

— A Correspondent of the Hindustan, writing from Napore, Poonah, states that a large quantity of sulphur, with several cases of musket flints, have been recently despatched from Calcutta to Napore, and conveyed with all possible secrecy through the British territories. This is only one of a hundred proofs of the hostile disposition of the Sepoys to Government. On the first appearance, or even rumour, of a reverse, the Sepoys would pour down upon our territories.

— Sir Willoughby Cotton having arrived at Peshawar, remains there, awaiting the reception of orders from Lord Auckland, either to return to Jelalabad, and assume the entire command of the forces across the Indus, or to come on into our provinces.

— Particulars of the skirmish in the Khyber Pass are given in this morning's Englishman. It was disastrous and disgraceful to us. The British troops consisted of a squadron of Cavalry, five Companies of Infantry and two guns; and this party is said to have been vanquished by a handful of undisciplined mountain marauders: not fewer than twenty or twenty-five were killed and wounded; the whole of the baggage captured, and several hundred camels carried off. It appears that the brave Sikhs fled, at once and precipitately, as soon as the enemy appeared.

— The fat case of the Rames of the late Hurrenath Roy versus his son, for the abstraction of some 20 or 25 lakhs of Rupees from their dwelling, but which he alleges to be his own property, is now fairly in the Supreme Court. It is to be heard at the close of this week.

ROADS IN THE MADRAS PRESIDENCY.

We are indebted to an obliging correspondent for the following acceptable memorandum on a subject that must always be of the deepest interest—the formation of good roads. Our correspondent sets a just value upon those passports to as well as fruits of civilization; and it is but justice to Lord Elphinstone to say that, were the means at his disposal equal to his will, this important branch of good government would give signs in every direction of the interest he brings to it.

“The Government are turning their attention with great spirit to Ghaut opening and road making. The Sampejee Ghaut leading from Merikara in Coorg to Mangalore is now quite open for travellers, and the Bridges will be shortly completed along that route, though what were constructed before the monsoon were severely tried by the torrents caused by the late unusually heavy S. W. rains, having been absolutely no feet under water, it is said, for some time. That splendid road made by the Sappers, and the eighteen miles thence to Fraserpet on the banks of the Cauvery, opened by the same valuable men in 1837 and 1838, have been connected at last with Perespattam, the frontier town of Mysore.

It is remarkable that the thirteen miles last alluded to, were left untouched for so long a period, as positively those who knew the country well were continually losing the road, so badly was it defined and so tortuous was it through a strip of thick Jungle near the immediate borders of Coorg. I have little doubt that travellers bound for the Neigherries from Bombay will, for the present, find it most advantageous to land at Mangalore, and, passing through the beautiful country of Coorg, proceed via Honoor, Mysore and Goundpet up the beautiful and easy “New Sengoor Ghaut.” I say for the present, since I understand that a short and direct road from Sultan’s Battery to Teppacandoo, and so up the New Sengoor Ghaut, will be immediately cleared properly and repaired, were necessary. You will observe that this last route is direct from Cannanore to Coopamund—and, as far as ‘Nellacottah’ (thirteen miles beyond Sultan’s Battery), the road alluded to passes through a lovely part of the Wynnad, and fifteen miles only are bothered with Jungle. This last part, however, will be traversed between six A. M. and 12 at noon, and the traveller in a pulkee even, leaving Sultan’s Battery at 10 P. M., will reach the foot of the New Sengoor Ghaut about 2 P. M. and be at Davis’ Hotel at Kullutty before sunset.

“You must remember that Lady Gough and family this year actually drove up this Ghaut, in their carriage with four horses, and it is affirmed that for the last 3 or 6 miles, the leaders might have been comfortably disposed with, and that throughout the heavily laden carriage got on with great ease, so that Mr. Davis’ intention to keep light conveyances for travellers and baggage will, I hope, be carried into speedy execution. The Ghaut now under survey, leading from Munneabad to Mangalore, discovered by Captain Green, of the Engineers, Superintendent of Maranur, in Mysore, will be a noble opening for trade. It is represented to be a natural break in the country, and the line will descend gradually without a zigzag to the tune of about 1 in 80 or 40. If Captain Green’s views are fully carried out, in the road between Bangalore and Mangalore will be shortened 25 miles, and there can be no doubt that the improvements in trade between Mysore and the Company’s country, which have already occurred under the enlightened rule of Lord Elphinstone and Colonel Cubbon, the natural break in the country, and the line will descend gradually without a zigzag to the tune of about 1 in 80 or 40. Good roads are the elements of wealth, and when we can enter our Horse Artillery from East to West, the evil disposed will think twice before they attempt to disturb the harmony and industrious habits of the cultivator and merchant.

“It may be added, without any disparagement to the Infantry

Sepoy, that Government would find it answer their purpose well, if increase to their Army be resolved on, to raise whole Regiments of such men as form the Sapper Corps. Men who will fight as well as their neighbours, and will work too at roads, &c. during times of peace. Such men will yield an annual return to Government, and, when working in Districts, would, at a moment’s notice, shoulder their fusils and concentrate where necessary.”—Madras Spectator.

MADRAS.

A meeting of respectable and influential natives was held at the rooms of the Hindoo Literary Society, on Monday evening, for the purpose of deciding on an address to Government, relative to the establishment of a College at Madras, for the benefit of their community. C. Streenevase Pillay was called to the chair, who explained the object for which the meeting was convened; after which, the memorial which had been prepared, was read and unanimously approved of. Further particulars of the proceedings have not yet reached us.—Madras Circulator.

RESUMPTION.

To the Editors of the Bengal Harbours.

SIR,—How is it you are now so silent about the resumption question? Some say you may be bought over like the pretended India’s friends;—others whisper that you are getting into that stage of life’s dream, when quiet is sought;—others say that the hot season we have had, has taken much of the resumption oil of former days, out of you. Be it this or that, matters little, for I believe you will a good man and true; but why so silent of late? for let me assure you the work of misery and distress goes on in the Mofussil, steadily and unabated;—every succeeding year brings with it an increased flight of villagers in the shape of Ameens, to prey upon the luckless subjects of the Company. Sixty were poured this year into a district that shall at present not be named, and I am very sure not one of these men will see the turn of 12 months service, without sending one thousand rupees to his home. Besides this, and his numerous attendant will rejoice every day upon the beat that the country can afford in the shape of food and clothing, and who pays for all this? Not the Government, for these Ameens get no allowance; not a farthing of the Company’s coin can be touch for at least two years, that is, until the result of his labours, the land reclaimed, is finally taxed and settled. The poverty-stricken inhabitants of the country feed and clothe in one piece (which under the perpetual settlement hardly pays Ameens) and, each with four, five and six followers, and besides this, each Ameens sends annually one thousand rupees to his home.

I shall now give you a figured statement of the case of an unfortunate man in my neighbourhood, who has now for four years been struggling to get his little property out of the tortuous grasp of the Special Deputy Collector; however as yet he appears about as near to this desired goal, as he was two years ago. For four years this unfortunate individual has been obliged to abandon his calling of Vakel at a Munsiff’s Court, where he tells me he never used to earn less monthly than 1500 rupees. He has been obliged to abandon this entirely, to look after his little ancestral property. But to my figures.

His Talook, called “Botton Ram,” has an annual rent-roll of rupees ... .. 810
The Government Revenue, ... .. 15
Interest and batta at Collector’s shop, ... .. 12
Mofussil expenses, collecting, &c., ... .. 42 169

Leaving a clear profit to Talookdar of ... .. 141

The Talook measures in all 73 khadas, out of which the Deputy Collector has seized upon 58 khadas, and if he succeeds in resuming it, which, as things go on, he is more than likely to do, the loss of 58 khadas will take 210 rupees from my friend’s rent-roll, leaving only 54 rupees to pay expense of collection, and 115 rupees of Government Revenue.

The struggle for four years has cost the defendant as follows, and let me tell you, I was particular in making him refer to his books of expenditure.

1st. Loss of earnings at Munsiff’s Court 15 rupees a month for 4 years, ... .. 720
2d. Paid to Ameens, ... .. 40
3d. Do. No. 3 do. ... .. 25
4th. Stamp Paper, Deans, &c. ... .. 15
5th. Feens with Ameens at different dates, ... .. 184
6th. Witnesses’ boat hire, &c., different dates, ... .. 144
7th. Vakel’s fees, &c., &c. ... .. 53
8th. Deans khurah at the Station, 25 miles from the man’s home, ... .. 24
9th. Being obliged to borrow from time to time sums of money to carry on the suit. Interest of which, ... .. 1,45

Actual pecuniary loss to this date, ... .. Rs. 1,45
Now here is a case, and hundreds if not thousands exist similar to it, on the files of the Resumption Officers, where if Government succeed, the proprietor is ruined and his little Talook must fall into the hands of Government, for who will purchase a place with not sufficient credit the Government Revenue, and on the other hand, if the Talukdar should succeed in being allowed to retain his land, he will do so, at an expense greatly exceeding the value of it.

I may finish this epistle by telling you, what you know very well, that nothing tends so much to stop litigation as despair, and this despair is so operating upon vast multitudes, that they are allowing matters to take their chance; and perhaps better it will be, in place of sending away so much money in an extremely doubtful case. As for the Special Deputy Collectors, they get their pay and do not, as the Amceas do, prey upon the country; but here the contract ends; and I do not say too much when I add, after seeing a few of those worthless, that they lose their perception of right, and was 19, in the desire to grasp at all they can for Government. I say it now, (and will return again to the subject,) the work now going on in the Provinces, is a shame to the British character; it is a disgrace to Britain's sons. The Government ought to be reminded, too, that in all cases the physical strength resides in the governed, discontent is abroad, and the sword may be about that point when another turn will be too much.

Your obedient servant,
HOMO.

November 30, 1839.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—Have you not been premature in congratulating your Correspondents on their relief from the administration of Heathen and Mohammedan Oaths, in your article of 31st ultimo? The Draft of the New Act does not say, or apparently mean, that any alteration is to be made in the existing system, except where witnesses object to take the oath offered to them. It is merely proposed to enact, that no witness shall be "compellable" to swear on the Koran or Ganga Jul, but that these oaths are not to be tendered and administered, if the witness consents. If the Draft of the Act can fairly be made to bear another interpretation, or can be altered into an abolition of the present law before it is finally passed, I should be heartily glad. In the Western Provinces, I believe, few people object to taking an oath, except men of some pretensions to respectability; and they, as far as I have seen, do so (the Mussulmans, at least), on the ground that it is casting discredit on their honour to suppose that their simple word requires any confirmation.

Yours obediently,
A READER.

RELIGIOUS.

THE NEXT WESLEYAN CONFERENCE, it has been determined, shall be held at Newcastle-upon-Tyne.—Pat.

MISS NEWCOMB, daughter of the Rev. R. Newton, of Wesleyan Methodist minister, has (it is stated) embraced the Roman Catholic faith.—Ibid.

LORD BOLINGBROKE ON DIVINE GRACE.—Lord Bolingbroke was one day sitting in his house at Battersea, reading Calvin's "Institutes," when he received a morning visit from Dr. Church. After the usual salutations, he asked the Doctor if he could guess what the book was which then lay before him; and "No," says Lord Bolingbroke, "I have been studying?" "No, really my lord, I cannot," guesses the Doctor. "It is Calvin's 'Institutes,'" said Lord Bolingbroke. "What do you think of these matters, Doctor?" "Oh, my lord, we don't think about such antiquated stuff; we teach the plain doctrines of virtue and morality, and have long laid aside those abstruse points about grace." "Look you, Doctor," said Lord Bolingbroke, "you know I don't believe the Bible to be a divine revelation; but they who do, can never defend it on any principle but the doctrine of grace. To say truth, I have at times been almost persuaded to believe it upon this view of things; and there is one argument which has gone very far with me in behalf of its authenticity, which is, that the belief in it exists upon earth, even when committed to the care of such as you, who pretend to believe it, and yet deny the only principles on which it is defensible."—Countess of Huntingdon's Life and Times, Vol. II.

REVIVAL OF RELIGION IN BERLIN.—The following electrifying religious intelligence is contained in a letter from the Rev. Mr. Kuntze, Chaplain to the Orphan-house Clasica at Berlin; communicated to the Christian Observer by the Rev. Dr. Steinkopf. It is dated June 1, 1839. "A revival is taking place in our Protestant Church; the number of true believers in Christ increases; many applications are made to our clergy for spiritual instruction and advice; in addition to four churches built a few years ago at Berlin, another is soon to be erected. Among our clergy the want of a closer and more intimate connection is deeply felt, and I trust before the present year expires, an association, embracing all the city clergy, shall be formed for the express purpose of mutual consultation on important ecclesiastical and ministerial subjects. The missionary cause extends further and further, and begins to exercise a mighty influence. On the 29th of May we celebrated the anniversary of our Missionary Society, at which three additional messengers of peace to the heathen—the Rev. Messrs. Possett, Winter, and Lielheld—were solemnly set apart for the service of Christ in South Africa. The interest excited was so great, that the Church overdone, and could not contain all who were anxious to crowd into it. The propagation of the Gospel of Christ among the ancient people of God makes still more rapid progress. No Rabbinical opposition, however artfully contrived, can now stem the tide of Israel's conversion. They now join the Christian Church by tens and twenties, and I confidently anticipate their doing so soon by hundreds. I allow that some are actuated by impure motives—even the strictest precaution cannot prevent the intrusion of some insincere and hypocritical professors; yet I can state with perfect conviction, that many are under the influence of right and truly Christian principles, stand firm and are steadfast in the faith. The number of those whom I have myself baptised, amounts to 100. In a short time I shall baptise a negro whom I have had under my instruction for upwards of a year. On the other side, wickedness and iniquity, in the greatest enormity, abound. Some of our public papers and periodical works much aid the cause of infidelity; but we trust that the Lord will overrule all for good. The controversy now going on between the Roman Catholic and Protestant Church has already been productive of much good to the latter."—Pat.

INDEPENDENCE OF JERUSALEM.—BERLIN, Aug. 17th.—The subject has been suggested here for some days past, that a petition is to be presented to the King, the object of which evokes much interest. It is to the effect that His Majesty, in conjunction with the other four great powers, do emancipate the city and district of Jerusalem, upon which are concentrated the dearest and holiest recollections of all Christians, and supply in common the means of maintaining the independence of that sacred territory.—Ibid.

EDUCATION.

AGRICULTURAL PROFESSOR AT OXFORD.—At the late meeting of the Agricultural Society at Oxford, the gratifying fact was announced, that the authorities of that University would not permit another year to transpire without establishing an agricultural professorship. The country, we believe, is indebted to Dr. Buckland for the suggestion; and we understand that Mr. Sedgewick, his brother geologist at Cambridge, intends to press the same subject there. This is what ought to have been done many years ago. Indeed, it was proposed by Bishop Watson at Cambridge, on his taking the chemical chair, nearly half a century ago.—Bristol Mirror.

NEW YORK.—In the single state of New York there are 10,000 district schools, paid for by the commonwealth. These contain, at the present time, 540,000 scholars. Expenses, 1,036,000 dollars annually. There are besides, 147 incorporated academies, with 20,000 students; and public colleges containing, 1,036 alumni.—Pat.

SCIENTIFIC.

THE GALVANIC TELEGRAPH AT THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—The space occupied by the case containing the machinery (which simply stands upon a table, and can be removed at pleasure to any part of the room) is little more than that required for a gentleman's hat-box. The telegraph is worked by merely pressing small brass keys (similar to those on a keyed bugle), which acting (by means of galvanic power) upon various hands placed upon a dial plate at the other end of the telegraphic line, as far as now opened, point not only to each letter of the alphabet (as each key may be at each end), but the numerical points are indicated by the same means, as well as the various points, from a comma to a colon, with notes of admiration and interrogation. There is likewise a cross (X) upon the dial, which indicates that when this key is struck, a mistake has been made in some part of the sentence telegraphed, and that it "exaggerate" is intended. A question—such, for instance, as the following:—"How many passengers started from Brayton by the ten o'clock train?" and the answer could be transmitted from the terminus to Brayton and back in less than two minutes. This was proved on Saturday. This mode of communication is only completed as far as the West Brayton station, which is about 13 miles from Paddington. There are wires (as may be imagined) communicating with each end, thus completed, pass-having undergone any change, unless Lord Howick's removal and the expected accession of Mr. Massey may tend to facilitate the adoption of Liberal measures. Lord John Russell's taking the Colonial office has excited some surprise and much speculation. The fact is, that his health was breaking down under the harassing duties of the Home Secretaryship, in addition to those of leader of the Commons. The Colonial will be a less laborious post, though one of higher responsibility; and it is supposed that the new arrangements respecting Canada will be more fitly and competently superintended by Lord John Russell as the head of the Colonial Department.—Pat.

THE THAMES POLICE.—The consolidation of the office with the land police was effected on Saturday, at the office of the Metropolitan Police Commissioners in Scotland-yard, and the Thames Police, which has existed as an independent body under the control of the Magistrates, subject to the authority of the Home-office, for thirty-nine years, now forms part of the general police of the metropolis.—Ibid.

CHATHAM, AUG. 27.—A novel operation took place in Chatham Dockyard last week—that of lengthening the Gleaner steam-vessel, which has been taken into dock for the purpose. She was seen in two a little more than one-third of her length from her stern, and wires were laid from the fore part of her to tread on the purchase-falls were rove and brought to two-capstans, and, the order being given by the master shipwright, the men hove away, and in five minutes the fore section was separated from the after part a distance of 18 feet. The space between will now be filled up by new timber. There is no record of any ship or vessel having been lengthened in this dockyard before the Gleaner.—Kentish Observer.

HATCHING EGGS.—The Ornithological Society have come to the determination of hatching the eggs of all their rare birds by means of the Eoscolabion, instead of entrusting them to the caprices of the parent, as in the latter case they have generally failed.—Atlas.

TUNNELS AT LIVERPOOL.—A meeting was held last week at Liverpool, for the purpose of forming a company to undertake to make a tunnel under the Mersey, to connect Liverpool with the Cheshire side of the river. Mr. Stevenson, Mr. Vignoles, and other eminent engineers, declared the undertaking practicable.—Atlas.

MANCHESTER AND LEEDS RAILWAY promises to be the most successful railway in the kingdom. At present it is only open for passengers—from Manchester to Roedale. On the 19th and 20th ult. not less than 9,522 passengers passed along the line; and the average daily number is upwards of 2,000.—Pat.

IMMENSE ANNUAL ISSUE OF BARE COIN.—We heard it mentioned on Saturday, by Mr. Sergeant Atcherly, the Attorney-General for the County Palatine, in allusion to the importance of the Mint prosecutions, that not less than 3,000 persons are at present engaged in counterfeiting and uttering base coin in the United Kingdom, and that the amount annually put in circulation is not less than 600,000*l.* Doubtless the evil would be still more extensive but for the exertions of the Mint, through their indefatigable agent, Mr. Powell, in bringing offenders to this description to justice.—Liverpool Chronicle.

THE GREAT LORD CHATMAN AND THE DISSENTERS.—In the House of Lords, Archbishop Drummond (of York) attacked the Dissenting ministers as "men of close ambition;" but they met with an able advocate in the celebrated Lord Chatham, who said:—"The Dissenting ministers are represented as 'men of close ambition'; they are no, my lords, and their ambition is to keep close to the College of Fishermen, not of Cardinals, and to the doctrines of inspired Apostles, not to the decrees of interesting and aspiring bishops; they contend for a spiritual creed, and spiritual worship. We have a Calvinistic creed, a Popish liturgy, and an Arminian clergy! The Reformation has laid open the Scriptures to all; let not the Bishops shut them again. Laws in support of ecclesiastical power are pleaded which it would shock humanity to execute. It is said that religious sects have done great mischief where they were not kept under restraint, but history affords no proof that sects have ever been mischievous where they were not oppressed and persecuted by tyrannical Church."—Countess of Huntingdon's Life and Times, 2 vols.

THE ECCLESIASTIC REVIEW, Sept. 1, 1839.—We have just had time to glance at the contents of this Number; viz. On the present state of the Catholic controversy;—Stephen's Life and Times of Archbishop Sharp, "one of the most pungent books that we have encountered for a long time;"—a curious gossiping article on London Exhibitions, bitter for the page of a magazine;—Dutton on the African Slave-trade; (no account is given, however, of Mr. Dutton's plan for extirpating the trade, and of the new African Society);—The political duty of Christians, a very spirited paper, not a review, having for its text, the sacred term, political dissenters; (from this we shall extract largely, and should like to see it reprinted entire);—Habeas Corpus for the Canadian prisoners, a legal argument;—Hanbury's Historical Memorials;—and Estlin on National Economy and Taxation. Our readers will see that the interest of the Number is sufficiently varied, the Editor always managing to keep abreast with the topics of the day. Literature must now-a-days wait on politics. This Journal is deservedly rising, and is performing a most important service by its uncompromising boldness in these times of increasing cowardice, apathy, and renal defection.—Pat.

WOMAN'S PLACE SET IN POLITICAL CONTRAST.—Participation in scenes of popular emotion has a natural tendency to warp conscience and overture charity. Now, conscience and charity (or love) are the very essence of woman's beneficial influence; therefore every thing tending to blunt the one, and sour the other, is sedulously to be avoided by her. It is of the utmost importance to men to feel, in consulting a wife, a superior, or a sister, that they are appealing from their passions to pre-judices, and not to them as embodied in a second self; nothing tends to give opinions such weight as the certainty that the utterer of them is free from all petty or personal motives. The beneficial influence of woman is nullified if once her motives, or her personal character, come to be the subject of attack; and this fact alone ought to induce her patiently to acquiesce in the plan of exclusion from public affairs.—Woman's Mission—a new work, by a lady.—Ibid.

THE EXPERIMENTAL WOODEN PAVING OF OXFORD-STREET.—On Tuesday afternoon, the experimental paving committee proceeded to Oxford-street, for the purpose of a minute examination. Having completed the survey of the road, the committee adjourned to the Court-house, and, after a long discussion, the following resolution was passed:—"That the appearance to the committee that the wooden paving has proved itself equal to the traffic and paving of the whole of Oxford-street, and it is, therefore, resolved to recommend to the vestry to adopt the wooden-black paving for that thoroughfare, subject to certain conditions and regulations."—Ibid.

THE LATE SIR ROBERT GRIEISON, BART.—This venerable baronet died on the 15th of August at the age of one hundred and six years, after having succeeded to the title and estate of his late father, Sir Gilbert, upwards of seventy-three years ago. Previous to his father's death Sir Robert was in the army, and was the officer commanding the salute fired at Gibraltar upon the birth of George IV. Before his father's death he retired upon half-pay, which he enjoyed to receive regularly for seventy-six years, we may safely assert as unprecedented term of years. This venerable man never had one day's illness during his truly patriarchal life, and died without any bodily suffering.—Dunfermlie Herald.

RESULTS OF DORNEYBROOK FAIR.—This fair terminated on Saturday—we trust for ever—as certainly it must have turned out any thing but calculated to afford satisfaction to such as were at all concerned with it. In respect to the proprietors of tents or booths, they could not be said to be gainer by the fair. The place presented no attraction whatever to visitors, except to those of the very lowest order; while, notwithstanding the salutary restrictions placed upon tent keepers to close at six in the evening, the quantity of offences which each day came under magisterial cognizance exhibited a long catalogue. Saturday morning the fair ground and adjoining localities exhibited a scene comfortable and wreathed in life extreme. A fine fall fell in torrents, and covered the earth ankle deep with mud and mire. The shivering inmates of tents, the covering of which merely consisted of blankets, or such other sleeping appendages as could be procured, and which, easily penetrated by the wet, proved poor shelter against the inclement weather, might be seen on every side striking their tents, and hurrying off as fast as possible venting the contrary of blessings upon de Broek. At six the general wreck commenced, and in half an hour not a single pole was left standing.—Pat.

BRANDING A DISSENTER.—A few mornings since the operation of branding a dissenter was performed in the Tower on a private belonging to the Fusilier Guards, who had been sentenced by a court-martial to be branded with the letter D, and to undergo three months' imprisonment in the Penitentiary, for desertion. The man was brought from the place in which he had been confined about ten o'clock. The shape of the letter was first marked with some colouring on his back, and afterwards traced with a sharp instrument in longitudinal lines. When this was completed, the letter was finished by means of a needle fixed in a cork, and finally rubbed with a colouring mixture, which it is impossible to eradicate. The man appeared to suffer a good deal of pain while it was being performed, and the sweat ran rapidly down his face. The punishment was inflicted by a drummer, in the presence of Dr. Parnham, the surgeon of the regiment. The man was subsequently conveyed to the military hospital.—Ibid.

EMPLOYMENT OF TIME.—The Chancellor Agnew has wrote a work on jurisprudence, in five volumes, in the quarter of an hour each day his wife kept him waiting for dinner.—Ibid.

AN AUTOGRAPH COLLECTOR.—There may invariably be a collector at the Auction Mart, on the Place de la Bourse, a celebrated collector of autographs, who possesses the writing of all famous personages; but within the last month, he has laboured under a mortal affliction—ten lines of Muller's own writing escaped him, and became the property of a celebrated English amateur. He will not recover the shock; his days are numbered: he bears nothing—sees nothing, but walks about like a miserable arch on whom some inveterate faculty is heavily weighing. He considers himself as a disconsolate individual; his collection of autographs was once reputed to be the finest of all collections existing, and now it is only the second in rank.—Put.

SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION OF A DRUNKARD.—The Gazette de Picardie states that a woman of Barwhein, in Belgium, who had contracted habits of intoxication, perished last week by spontaneous combustion. Persons who were present, says this journal, declare that the fire commenced in the mouth, and then extended to the breast and anus.—Ibid.

THE Pacha has lately created Chut Bey, first physician to Mehemet Ali, Commander of the Orders of St. Gregory the Great; and presented Mehemet Ali with a superb snuff-box and a variety of fine medals, in return for the Pacha's portrait.—Ibid.

PRINCE METTERLICH.—The following article, dated Vienna, Aug. 18, appears in the Leipziger Gazette:—"It is said that some alarming symptoms manifested themselves in the state of M. de Metterlich, in consequence of which the fugal fleet. Crowds flocked to the Minister's residence to obtain information respecting the illustrious patient. This day's bulletin gives hopes, but it is not satisfactory. It is as follows:—The fever is very mild; the night has been tranquil, and the regular progress of the malady permits the hope of an early change." It is said that the Prince has received the sacraments. The public are already beginning to speculate as to the successor of M. de Metterlich in the event of his death. Prince Esterhazy, our ambassador at the Court of St. James, is spoken of. Some time ago, when Prince de Metterlich was indisposed, it was reported that an illustrious personage had asked his opinion as to his successor, and that he had mentioned Prince Esterhazy, Count d'Appony, and Baron de Wessenberg." Accounts from Vienna of only one day earlier date, quoted by the Frankfurt Journal, state that the Prince's fever had entirely left him.

BERLIN, August 28.—A countrywoman of yours, resident in Bavaria, (I believe in Munich itself,) published, three or four months ago, a detailed account of the crimes connected with the sad tale of Casper Hauser. According to these revelations, he was the son of a Hungarian Princess and a cavalry officer, and was murdered by the agency of those who gave him life, not without the conscious and self-interested aid of an English aristocrat. This account has not yet been refuted, notwithstanding the heinous accusations it involves. It is worth believing that this melancholy history is only a new confirmation of the German proverb,—Die kleinen dinge hangt man, die grossen last man auf sich.—"Small things are hanged, great ones are suffered to escape."—Ibid.

RUSSIA AND AFFAIRS IN THE EAST.—In a communication made by Count Medem, Russian ambassador in Paris, to Marshal Soult, the former began by stating that Russia did not interfere in the affairs of Belgium or Spain, but that she had a direct interest in the affairs of the East; that she felt obliged to maintain that influence, so that if the Sultan asked for Russian aid, nothing should prevent Russia from affording it. M. Medem added, that if the Sultan called on England and France to send succour, then, and then only, would Russia tolerate the presence of their fleets at Constantinople. "Our vessels are ready," quoth Count Medem, "so are our troops; in forty-eight hours they can be under the walls of the Seraglio, whilst France requires three weeks to send troops. For every 10,000 men you send, Russia can send 30,000." This brutal farouche made the heart of the other tremble. "You replied, 'The Russians may do all this; but if they do, we will burn Sebastopol.'"—Courier Francais.

MUTINY IN THE RUSSIAN IMPERIAL GUARD.—The Commerces publishes a letter from St. Petersburg, dated the 14th ult., which states that a conspiracy had been discovered among the officers of the first corps d'armée, and of the Hussars of the Imperial Guard, in consequence of which numerous arrests had taken place. The commanders of both corps were moreover removed and placed on half-pay.—Put.

MEHEMET ALI.—He was born at Cavalla in Roumelia, and he told me he was the youngest of sixteen children. He was much indulged by his father and mother, and was a great favourite of his brothers and sisters. He once said to me, "Do not wonder if I am sometimes impatient and want to have my own way. I was never used to contradiction. I have scarcely ever known misfortune. I was born under a smiling star, and that star has smiled upon all my life through." I should tell you that Mehemet Ali was forty-six years old before he had learned either to read or write. "This he told me himself. I have heard that he was taught by his favourite wife, but he is fond of reading now; and one day when I entered his divan unannounced, I found him quite alone, with his spectacles off, reading a Turkish volume, which he was much enjoying, while a considerable pile of books were by his side. "It is a pleasant relief," he said,

"from public business; I was reading some amusing Turkish stories;" (probably the Arabian Nights) "and now let me tell you what have you to tell me?" There is great deal of sagacity in Mehemet Ali's conversation, particularly when he brooks or discovers the usual deceptions, the sort of information which his sitor is most able to give. He discourses with engineers about mechanical improvements—with military men on the art of war—with sea-officers on ship-building and naval manœuvres—with travellers on the countries they have visited—with politicians on public affairs. He very willingly talks of foreign countries, and princes, and statesmen, and is in the habit of mingling in the conversation of all sorts of anecdotes about himself and the events connected with his history. His phrases are often proverbial, and he, like most orientals, frequently introduces proverbs and imagery. I heard him once say, speaking of the agriculture of Egypt, "When I came to this country I only scratched it with a pin, I have now succeeded in cultivating it with a hoe; but soon I will have a plough passing over the whole land." You asked me, George, if he were not a cruel prince? and that he certainly is not, for many a generous deed has he done, and seldom will it be found that the reign of a Turkish sovereign is so little stained with blood. Mehemet Ali's great pride is Ibrahim Pacha; a victorious leader is always an object of admiration among Mussulmans, and Ibrahim Pacha's career has been one of brilliant military success. His father is fond of talking of his first-born son, and intended to bequeath the throne to him; "but," he said, "I had not an unbounded confidence in him for many years; no, not till his beard was almost as long as my own, and even changing its colour," said the Pacha to me; "but now I can thoroughly trust him." On the part of Ibrahim Pacha, though in rank above his father, (for the Pacha of the Holy City is the first Pacha of the Ottoman empire), there is always the utmost deference to Mehemet Ali's will. For the most part, the circumstances of his life he has always conducted in a judicious way for advice, and whenever he has been pressed by the representatives of the great Powers of Europe, he has invariably answered, that he should abide by the instructions he received from his father.—Bouring's Minor Morals, Part 3.

TEAK TREES IN EGYPT.—Among the various species of trees recently introduced into Egypt, the teak is considered by far the most valuable; it being the opinion of Mr. Traile, the English botanist, that it will thrive there as well as in India. About a dozen seeds having been sent as a present to Ibrahim Pacha from Hindostan, they were sown in the English garden at Rhonda, towards the close of 1837. Three of them took; and in two years one of the specimens had reached the height of nine feet. A Turkish officer, walking in the garden, happening to observe the straightness and beauty of the tree, thought it would make a good sabot, and with one stroke of his sabre levelled it with the ground.—St. John's Egypt.

STEAM P. WIND.—The Orpheus, Captain Bailey, one of the fastest sailing packets between Liverpool and New York, arrived on Tuesday last, having left the United States on the 1st August with the Great Western and British Queen steamers. The Independence, Capt. Nye, sailed on the 7th and reached Liverpool yesterday, the 28th. The steamers have, therefore, had considerably the advantage of the sailing packets on the last trip homeward. The Great Western effected the passage in twelve days and a half; the British Queen in fourteen days; the Orpheus in twenty-six days; and the Independence in twenty-one days—the balance in favour of the Great Western over the Orpheus being thirteen days and a-half, and over the Independence eight days and a-half; and in favour of the British Queen over the Orpheus twelve days, and over the Independence seven days. It should, however, be remembered, that Liverpool is one day's sailing, or half a day's steaming, further from New York than Bristol.—Liverpool Mail.

DUELLING IN THE UNITED STATES.—While in the States, Mr. Murray saw much reason to regret and condemn the system of duelling there practised. In the army and navy, duelling is so frequently frequent, though it is among civilians that the practice usually appears in its most detestable form. When at Leesburgh, near Washington, "I became acquainted (says he) with a gentleman, Colonel M., who had been concerned in one of those extraordinary duels unheard of in any other civilized nation. He had quarrelled with General M., to whom he was related (they were either first-cousins or brothers-in-law, I forget which), six upon some occasion of civilities and disputes, the practice Colonel M. knocked the General down. Of course he immediately challenged Colonel M., leaving him the choice of any medium of destruction which suited his fancy. Colonel M., knowing the General to be an experienced swordsman and an unerring shot, proposed to the gentleman who came to settle the preliminaries of this 'mighty pretty quarrel,' that he and the General should sit upon some occasion of civilities and disputes, and by the application of a match, both take a trip into the nether regions. This very suitable proposal was declined by the General; and the Colonel, as if determined to have the honour of his relation's company in his long journey 'from which no traveller returns,' suggested the propriety of their taking hands, and jumping together off the top of the Capitol. This courteous (query, courteous) offer was also declined by the unaccommodating and unreasonable General; and the third proposal of the Colonel was musket and ball, at five or ten paces (I forget which). To this arrangement there could be no objection. They met—fired together by signal—the General was shot through the heart, while his ball, which was pursuing its true course to his opponent's breast, struck against the breech of his musket, glanced off, and did no further injury than shattering a part of one of his wrists; he showed me the scar of this wound. I have given this story exactly as it was told me by several of the Colonel's own acquaintances in the town where he lives, and have no reason to doubt its correctness. It is only necessary to add, that both these parties were men of as high standing as any in their district, both members of the Legislature, and that this duel was fought within fifty miles of the capital of the United States." This system of fighting differs very little from deliberate murder; and it is preparing the mind for the perpetration of that worse crime, is shown by such incidents as the following, which occurred in the state of Louisiana. "On the 29th of February, 1835, a little before the usual time of the meeting of the House of Representatives, Mr. J. Grymes, a distinguished lawyer of New Orleans, entered the hall; and advancing towards Mr. Labranche, the Speaker of the House, raised his cane and struck him; whereupon Mr. Labranche drew a pistol, and fired at Mr. Grymes. The ball passed through the lapel of his coat; he immediately drew a pistol, and fired at Mr. Labranche, who fell, wounded. After a long dispute as to the right of the house to try Mr. Grymes for this assault, it was carried in the affirmative, and he was brought up to the bar and reprimanded!"—Chamber's Journal.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 13.—In Texas two battles have been fought with the Indians, who had assembled under a chieftain named Bowles, for the purpose of attacking the whites. They were defeated in two spirited engagements by the Texian troops under General Rush, and a great many killed. About nine of the Texans were killed, including two officers. The Indians, indeed, are becoming ferocious and sanguinary on every part of the frontier, while in Florida two more bloody tragedies have been enacted.

Near Fort Frank Brook, on the 24th ult. a party of Americans were fired upon by the savages; and Messrs. Henderson and Parks shot dead. Their eyes were then dug out, and the corpses frightfully mutilated.

The most horrible tragedy, however, took place on the following day, in the southern part of the Peninsula. Colonel Harney, of the United States army, was induced, on the representations of the Seminoles, to march to a post 250 miles from any other American station, with only 25 men. When he arrived there, his detachment was attacked perfunctory by a body of savages. Fifteen were killed on the spot, and the remainder, with their colonel, escaped with difficulty.

I informed you, in my last, of the battles between the Sioux and Chippewas, near the Falls of St. Anthony, in which 169 men had been killed. Besides this, foray, the "red axe has been dug up" by the Chippewas in Arkansas—between Kaskaskia and Young Black Hawk in the West, and by the Caddoes on the Natchez.

Thus the flames of Indian war are kindled in numerous places to a great extent. It is true, that in all instances of conflict between themselves, the chieftains and warriors gave orders that the whites (pale faces) shall not be molested; but when the Indian blood is up, there is no foreseeing the consequences. People are beginning to question the wisdom of that policy which banished them all into the same regions. Should a bold and artful chieftain arise, unite them under one head, the results might be dreadful, although their defeat and destruction would be ultimately certain. God forbid that they should ever make an inroad.—Put.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.—In Ohio, they have a literary gazette called the Bucky Blossom; and in Kentucky, the Rose of the Valley; in New Jersey, the Belvidere Apollo; in Maryland, the Red Eagle; in Ohio, also, the Toledo Blade; and in Mississippi, the Bonnie Knave.—Ibid.

AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES.—The Texas Star informs us that "a million of mummies have been discovered near Durango in Mexico." They are similar to the Egyptian mummies, and a portion of flint, a sculptured handle, necklaces of ivory and beads, mosaicine, &c., were also found at the same place. These, with the discoveries made in mounds forged like pyramids in several parts of North America, prove almost to a demonstration that the new world was recently peopled from Egypt, or from those parts of Asia over which Egyptian manner extended.—Ibid.

FATE OF POETS.—There are five thousand and twenty-three poets in the United States. Of these, ninety-four are in state prisons, five hundred and eleven in the lunatic asylums, and 200 hundred and eighty in the debtors' prisons.—New York Herald.

A MAN SOLD FOR DEBT.—A free negro, named "Tom," was a few days since sold at Annapolis into slavery for ten years, to satisfy a judgment (with cost) amounting to 70 dollars, obtained against him by a tailor with whom he had run a long score. It is not facile to add, that before the sale every opportunity was afforded. Tom to "work out" the debt, and after the sale several days were allowed him in which to arrange the matter, before the purchaser "put the screws on" and made a slave of him. The affair created a good deal of excitement.—[Query. Do the laws of Congress, under which Florida is governed as a territory of the U. S., allow the selling of freemen into slavery? What becomes of the efforts of Colonel Johnson and Mr. Talnage? Congress has an undoubted right to secure to every inhabitant of Florida the equal protection of the laws, and petitions should go up to that effect.—Editor of New York Emancipator.]

WEST INDIES.—We have to congratulate our readers, and the inhabitants generally of this parish, on the prosperous and pleasing state of agriculture in Trellawney. It affords an illustrious satisfaction to state, that notwithstanding the numerous difficulties with which all parties have had to contend, the crops are being rapidly taken off, and some estates have finished a successful harvest for the present season. In all probability, it will be shown that the crop of 1839 has exceeded that of the preceding year in no inconsiderable degree, though, upon some properties, there has been a great deficiency—the result of mismanagement. The estates under the superintendence of Messrs. Barrett, King, Edwards, Schermidde, Murray, Morrish, and a few others who prefer mild, instead of harsh measures, have succeeded, we are informed, beyond expectation; but we regret to learn that those under the control of Messrs. Jump, (of scribbling notoriety,) Fry, Dexter, Carey, Frater, McLaughlin, James, and Mitchell, have been conducted with an unwise policy; the consequence is, that the peasantry employed by these gentlemen are dissatisfied, and are anxious to locate themselves where they will be free from oppression, and from the abuse so wantonly lavished on them. Notices to quit have been issued by wholesale, for the purpose of frightening the people into the acceptance of low wages at the conclusion of the crop. These iniquitous notices have made the labourers determined to purchase homes, from which they cannot be summarily ejected, and thousands of pounds have been already deposited by them in the hands of their Ministers, for the purpose of carrying their noble and spirited determination into effect. Messrs. Knibb, Clarke, Dexter, and Dundy, have succeeded in buying large tracts of land, and assisted as these reverend gentlemen will be by the West India Land Investment Company, in the course of a short time townships will be built, and the proprietors, as they are called, will be independent of their present employers. We, therefore, warn those individuals who still cling with fondness to the evils of the old system, to be wise in time. If by harsh treatment they drive the peasantry from their present homes, they will have to pay long extra wages for their services, and the ruin of the estates under their management will be the inevitable result.—Falmouth (W. I.) Post, June 3, 1839.

THE PRECURSOR.—Nothing could afford a more decided confirmation of the propriety of starting a Steamer of our own, than the intelligence which has been received from England by the last Mail, extending to the 14th of October. The Court of Directors, we are informed, have shewn a very unequivocal determination not to depart from the narrow and exclusive line of navigation, which they now have adopted. If any thing could have influenced them to embrace a more liberal policy, it would have been the continued adhesion of the Board of Control to the Comprehensive Plan; but even this has failed to correct the contracted ideas they have embraced. Every successive Mail brings only a repetition of disappointments, and the most sanguine among us must be convinced by this time, that the Directors will do nothing; and that if we wait till they are propitiated, we may wait for ever. If there had been the slightest disposition to meet the exigencies and the wishes of the community in general; if there had not existed a determination sternly to refuse all compliance with them, the Court would have directed that one experimental voyage, at least, should be made from Calcutta to Suez, in the height of the monsoon, to ascertain whether the voyage hence would be more successful than the attempt from Bombay, which has now experienced three successive abortions. The Directors appear to dread, lest such a plan should turn out to be feasible. Our path of duty, therefore, is plain. We must start our own vessels, independently of any aid from Leadenhall Street. One vessel fairly under steam, others will, assuredly, follow. Our friends in England will hasten to our assistance, as soon as it is seen that we stand in little need of it. "When I really wanted a dinner," said Goldsmith, "nobody asked me. When I could command one myself, I was asked to twenty." Thus will it be with our steam communication. As soon as the Precursor has begun to perform her stated quarterly voyages, capitalists at home will begin to think it a great pity, and a burning shame, that she should be witted out a companion—and the monthly series will soon be filled up. And Her Majesty's Ministers, who still declare themselves willing to aid any plan, with a hundred thousand pounds sterling a year, will scarcely alter their minds as soon as they perceive that there are vessels on the line, prepared to claim the fulfilment of their promise.

One thing, however, is certain, that if we do not obtain the Precursor, we shall have no steamer from Calcutta to Suez for the next ten years. It is a pleasing testimony to the value of the plan which Mr. Turtton has brought forward, that it should have suggested itself spontaneously to those who are able to judge of the real state of things at home, at the same time that it was first mooted in India. The London Correspondent of the Englishman, writing in the middle of October, says, "Therefore, unless you give your money for a Provincial Scheme, and buy a few vessels on your own account, you will have no chance whatever." Our own Correspondent in London, one of the warmest friends of Steam Navigation, says, in a letter received by the last Mail, "No further progress has been made in the negotiation with the East India Company, touching the Steam Company; and I have ceased to dwell on it. I wish you could get up a Great Eastern of yourselves, and thus have what can be done. You have money enough." This coincidence of opinion on both sides the water, proves the necessity of the step which has been taken in Calcutta. Those who may have dismissed the idea of ever seeing a steamer start from Calcutta with their letters, or of ever availing themselves of one on their return to England, will, of course, withhold their support from this scheme. Those who still cherish a hope that Calcutta may possess its Sea Steamers, by which their letters and packets will be sent monthly, and in which they themselves may hope one day to embark for the Pyramids and old England, let them come forward and support the Precursor, with heart, and soul, and purse. It is now our only hope.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THOMAS BAMBINGTON MACAULAY.—The October Mail reached Calcutta on Friday morning last, in fifty-three days from London. If the preceding Mail was called barren, by what name shall we designate the present? Of political news, it brings us nothing. For the termination of the war in Spain, we were fully prepared by former accounts; the only addition to our intelligence now obtained is, that Louis Philip is likely to consolidate the Orleans throne, by marrying his son to the young Queen of Spain. Even the great Eastern question slumbers. The five powers are negotiating at Constantinople with an upper current of general interests, and an under current of particular interests upon the affairs of the East; a powerful and combined squadron of French and English ships occupies the Grecian seas, and the Turkish fleet is quietly anchored at Alexandria; and nothing is settled. Turkey and Egypt now occupy the attention, which was formerly fixed on Holland and Belgium; the scene of the conference has been transferred from the banks of the Thames, to the shores of the Bosphorus, and for ought we know, a new series of protocols may be about to commence, which shall end like the last, in leaving matters in status quo. Our sweet little Queen has paid her father's debts, and fallen out with her mother. Prince Albert, another Coburg, is described as sure of the family prize of the English crown. The American monetary crisis appears to be gathering to a head; and the Bank, which the inimitable Major Downing, of Downingville, laboured to prop up, with such unrivalled wit and humour, appears to be on the edge of bankruptcy. Still none of these are grave and striking events, calculated to give a deep interest to the present Mail. But there is one article of intelligence which fully redeems its character; and distinguishes this last Mail of the year from all its predecessors. Thomas Babington Macaulay, who left India, as it was said, amidst the curses of the Indian community, has been called into Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, constituted a Member of the Cabinet, appointed Secretary at War, and writes letters to his constituents, the electors of Edinburgh, from Windsor Castle. The man who was here denounced as a despot, and of whom it was predicted "He never shall sit in Parliament," has not only entered Parliament, as the representative of the Modern Athens, but has been received into the front ranks of the Ministry, and that a liberal Ministry, as a valuable acquisition! What his next step will be, it requires no conjury to foretell. Already in the Cabinet of Ministers, he will, of course, have the first refusal of any other situation which may fall in. His talents are not adapted for the War Office. As the Times observes, though a good reviewer in the Edinburgh, he will make but a sorry reviewer at the Horse Guards. Sir John Lubbock will soon be wanting a peerage, to which he has certainly as much right as Mr. Spring Rice. The Chair in Canon Row will then, in all probability, be vacated; and Mr. Macaulay's residence in India, and his acquaintance with Indian affairs, will naturally point him out as the legitimate successor of Sir John; and we may soon have to announce the appointment of the Right Honourable Thomas Babington Macaulay, as President of the Board of Control.

THE RESUMPTIONS.—We are happy to perceive that Government has, at length, yielded to the general wishes of its servants, by declaring that lands held under tenures which are found, on examination, to be fraudulent, shall be taxed at only half the rent paid by the cultivator. The subject has been urged for a length of time on the attention of the Supreme Authorities, by all those who were anxious that the operation of the Resumption Laws should fall as lightly as possible on the community, and that the rights of the State to the rent of alienated lands should be vindicated in a spirit of conciliation and indulgence. We congratulate the rent free holders on a concession, which goes far to lighten the severity of the laws. If the Government could further devise some plan for relieving the people from the exactions of the Native Officers employed in this department of the public service, no subject of reasonable complaint would be left. Perhaps our readers need scarcely be informed, that the Circular Orders of June 14th, 1837, laid it down as a rule, that the holders of rotten tenures should, on their being resumed, be required to pay a rental, calculated at three-fourths of the produce. Lord William Bentinck's long and memorable letter of the 26th Sept. 1832, laid down a more severe rule, and adjudged but twenty per cent. to the holders of such lands. This rule has necessarily been modified in practice; and we have been credibly informed, that in some instances the settlement officers have been obliged to anticipate the arrangement which has now become law. Some of our Contemporaries are disposed to ascribe the present relaxation to the efforts of the Landholders' Society. What influence that body may have exercised on the Supreme Council, we are, of course, ignorant; though judging from the state of torpidity into which it has fallen since the reply of Government was received to its Memorial regarding Resumptions, we are not disposed to estimate that influence very highly; but of this we are certain, that the rule which has now obtained the force of law, was warmly advocated before this body had an existence. The new law is so reasonable and equitable, that we are not surprised to find the puternity of it claimed for the Society. The barristers of the Supreme Court, and the British India Society, have just succeeded in breathing new life into that dormant association; and it is said now to claim the remaining half of the rent of all tenures that were alienated from the State by fraud and collusion.

As the question of Resumptions is about to be discussed at home, it is almost redundant to open it anew in this country. Yet we cannot allow the following remarks of the Hurkaru to pass without some observation:—

"Now, whatever delusion there may be on other subjects at home, the principle of the Resumption law is so obviously founded on bad faith, that we apprehend there can be no delusion on that subject, on the part of those who may there oppose it; and when they learn how the law has been applied here, 400 cases decided in one day in favour of Government, they will, we suspect, be inclined to think, that all that has been said against it, falls short of the real merits of this precious specimen of legislation. The argument of inequality of taxation, will fail of its effect; for the evil of inequality is remedied by a still greater evil, when the equalizing process is opposed to good faith and justice."

We, on the contrary, are ready to prove,—if proof be still wanting,—that the principle of the Resumptions is founded on good faith, justice and equity; and that the bad faith lies at the door of those who fraudulently usurped the revenues of the State, and created the necessity of these Resumptions. We dread not the result of the closest and most searching enquiry at home into the nature of the Government demand. The more the subject is sifted, the clearer will the nature of the fraud, and the justice of Resumption, be apparent. It will be seen at once, when the subject is fairly examined, that it was after the acquisition of the country by the English Government, when from its ignorance of the revenue system of the exchequer, the collection of the land rents was entrusted to Native agency, that the great bulk of these fraudulent tenures were created; that thousands of deeds were forged; that tens of thousands of acres, of which the State had always enjoyed the rent, were clandestinely made over to private individuals, and that an annual revenue, not far short of a million sterling, was abstracted from the resources of the State. It will be seen, that as soon as the Government became aware of the pillage then going forward, the people were warned that no alienation made subsequent to the acquisition of the country by the British, would be recognized; and as the new deeds had, in many instances, been antedated, a proclamation was made, that no rent-free tenure would be deemed valid, which was not proved to have been held before the year 1765. To prevent further frauds, an office was erected for the Registration of all these deeds; but they continued to multiply in spite of every precaution. At the period of the perpetual settlement, in 1793, the rent of all the land in the three provinces was fixed for ever, with the exception of that which was held under free tenures; and it was distinctly stated, that no such tenure would be recognized, before its validity had been established by a judicial examination. Rules were drawn up, and a process of enquiry instituted, to determine the validity of these grants. Other rules have subsequently been passed, with the view to accelerate the enquiry, which is now far advanced to a completion. And is Government to be charged with bad faith and injustice, when, in these circumstances, it seeks the recovery of those revenues, which have ever belonged to the State, and against the alienation of which it has so constantly protested?

THE LANDHOLDER'S SOCIETY.—As we are not likely to receive a report of the proceedings at the meeting of the Landholder's Society, held on Saturday last, before our number goes to press, we must necessarily postpone any remarks we may have to offer to the following week. Meanwhile, however, we notice a glaring inaccuracy into which the Hurkaru has fallen, in his remarks on our article of last week. Our Contemporary charges us with having "impaired the integrity of that body, and held them up to reprobation, as associated for the purpose of misrepresentation." If he will peruse our remarks, he will find that we said no such thing. We spoke entirely in the future tense, of what might possibly happen in the progress of circumstances. We charged no misrepresentations on that Association; and for the best of all reasons, because it has, as yet, sent home no representations at all. But we did hint the possibility of their being put forth; and the more we are enabled to discover of the animus of the London Society, the more clearly does it appear a duty to point out the danger to which the Calcutta Association is exposed, of sliding into misrepresentations. This body is organized in India for the express purpose of obtaining redress for a supposed grievance, which severely affects its pecuniary interests; and, however constitutional the means it may employ for relief, its feelings, exasperated by a sense of alleged injustices, are enlisted against the public authorities of the land. It has just formed an alliance with a body at home, which, in its reckless attacks upon every measure of the Government of India, appears to have forgotten altogether the necessity of preferring truth to rhetorical exaggeration. There can be no doubt that any representation from this country, which may serve to degrade the Government, and hold it up to the scorn and hatred of mankind, will be cordially welcomed in England, and made to resound through the kingdom. In these circumstances, we think it no impeachment of the integrity of the Landholders' Society, to suggest the danger of its being led, by the current of its own indignation against Resumption, to the adoption of statements and views which will not bear a strict examination. Its resentments against those who are seeking to recover the alienated resources of the State, are not likely to be extinguished, or even soothed, by communications with a body like the British India Society. Of the spirit which animates the members of that Society, take the latest specimen from the speech delivered by Mr. Thompson, at Manchester, which appeared in Tuesday's Englishman.

"The Rev. Dr. Duff, than whom there is not a more sincere lover of India—a man whose life, whether he traverses this country to awaken public feeling, or labours in India itself, is devoted to the good of India. That reverend gentleman made use of the following words before the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland the year before last:—

"Who can obliterate the long, black catalogue of treachery and plunder, devastation and death, that swells the revolting narrative of many of our earlier conquests? Ah! there have been deeds perpetrated by the sons of Britain on the plains of Hindoostan,—deeds that, in number, cannot be reckoned up in order,—deeds of unutterable infamy,—deeds that are engraven in characters of blood in the ineffaceable pages of history,—ay, and registered, as an eternal memorial against us, in the book of God's remembrance!"

"I have not, as you will bear me witness, during the two past lectures, nor will it be my object to-night, degraded the East India Company in your eyes. I have not occupied your time, or my own, in dragging to light the deeds of darkness that have been perpetrated in India; I have not spoken of treaties, of forgotten pledges, of immolated princes and princesses, of wholesale and stupendous robberies that have rendered those who have been guilty of them infamous for ever."

Even supposing all this to be as true as it is unfounded, what possible advantage, we would ask, can be expected from declaiming against supposed atrocities, of which the present members of Government at home and in India are quite as innocent as Dr. Duff or Mr. Thompson? Need we remind our readers, that there was a time when similar exaggerations and misrepresentations were echoed in Westminster Hall, and widely disseminated through our native land, by men of superlative talents, who had been misled by their informants; that those statements, which thrilled through the Senate, and at the recital of which, the beauty and fashion of England swooned away, when weighed in the balances of truth, were found utterly wanting. Read this magnificent burst of eloquence from Burke's speech against Hastings, in describing scenes of oppression at Dinagpore and Rangoon.

"The cattle and corn of the husbandmen were sold for less than a quarter of their value, and their huts reduced to ashes! the unfortunate owners were obliged to borrow from usurers, that they might discharge their bonds, which had unjustly and illegally been extorted from them while they were in confinement; and such was the determination of the infernal fiend, Dauli Sing, to have these bonds discharged, that the wretched husbandmen were obliged to borrow money, not at twenty, or thirty, or fifty, or ty, but at six hundred per cent. to satisfy him! Those who could not raise the money, were most cruelly tortured: cords were drawn tight round their fingers, till the flesh of the four on each hand was actually incorporated, and became one solid mass: the fingers were then separated again by wedges of iron and wood driven in between them.—Others were tied two and two by the feet, and thrown across a wooden bar, upon which they hung, with their feet uppermost; they were then beat on the soles of the feet, till their toe-nails dropped off.

"They were afterwards beat about the head till the blood gushed out at the mouth, nose, and ears; they were also flogged upon the naked body with bamboo canes, and prickly bushes, and, above all, with some poisonous weeds, which were of a most caustic nature, and burnt at every touch. The cruelty of the monster who had ordered all this, had contrived how to tear the mind as well as the body; he frequently had a father and son tied naked to one another by the feet and arms, and then flogged till the skin was torn from the flesh; and he had the devilish satisfaction to know that every blow must hurt; for if one escaped the son, his sensibility was wounded by the knowledge he had that the blow had fallen upon his father: the same torture was felt by the father, when he knew that every blow that missed him had fallen upon his son.

"The treatment of the females could not be described:—dragged forth from the inmost recesses of their houses, which the religion of the country had made no many sanctuaries, they were exposed naked to public view: the virgins were carried to the Court of Justice, where they might naturally have looked for protection; but now they looked for it in vain; for in the face of the Ministers of Justice, in the face of the spectators, in the face of the sun, those tender and modest virgins were brutally violated."

We need scarcely inform the reader that there is not one atom of truth in the whole of this representation; that it is from beginning to end as much a fiction, as the story of Sinbad the Sailor; and that between them there is only this difference, that the one was created for harmless amusement; the other, to crush an opponent.

BURMESE AFFAIRS.—Intelligence has been received from Rangoon to the 20th of last month. It is of a highly satisfactory nature. H. M. S. Comary, on entering the Port, was greeted with a salute of thirteen guns. Nothing could exceed the civility and respect manifested by the public authorities to the Commander and his Officers. A dinner was ~~got~~ up by the Governor on the occasion; and he subsequently visited the vessel, and was enabled to examine the interior arrangements of this British man-of-war, and will, doubtless, communicate his astonishment to the Golden Feet. It appears that Tharrawaddee, if he ever entertained any warlike intentions; has laid them aside for the present; if his intentions were pacific, they have been abundantly strengthened; and there appears no prospect of our being forced into a war with the Burmese. A private letter from Rangoon, quoted in the Moulmein Chronicle, states that a Woungie is about to be deputed by the King to visit Rangoon, Bassein and Martaban, "to see that the peace is kept with the English, and that the Governors of those places adopt no measures likely to bring on a collision." The King has also expressed his desire to have foreign merchants reside at Awa, and has shown a degree of anxiety at the disappearance of a few of them, especially as there was "peace between his country and the English." The Woodcock of Rangoon has gone so far as to enquire why the Missionaries, who left the country a year ago, had not returned. One of the negotiations of peace is, perhaps, to be gathered from the pacific tone of the Moulmein Chronicle, which has hitherto been in the habit of advocating a resort to the ultima ratio of the sword. We believe our Contemporary was as conscientious when he urged war, as he is now in advocating peace. Situated at the head quarters of our Burmese po-sessions, he is in the best position for watching the rise and fall of the political barometer, and estimating the probabilities of war or peace. When, therefore, we find him alluding with complacency "to a favourable change in Tharrawaddee's mind," we naturally conclude that the chance of war have, by a great measure, disappeared.

Our Contemporary has offered various conjectures respecting the cause of this change. We will not add to them. This, at least, however, we may be assured of, that while the mortification of defeat is kept fresh at the Burmese Court by our continued occupation of the conquered provinces, nothing but a firm conviction of our power, and a dread of consequences, can be supposed to keep a monarch, in the position of Tharrawaddee, from rushing into hostilities with us, to retrieve the national honor, and restore the integrity of the empire. It is highly possible that our successes across the Indus may have been narrated in the royal presence, and that the continuation of peace with Burmah may have been secured, by the occupation of Cabul. Clantham used to say, that he would conquer French America, in Germany, and our successes in Afghanistan may, possibly, have dispelled all the dreams of war in which the Cabinet of Ava had been indulging. If this be the case, we think that the present pseudo disposition of the King is likely to continue. For at the same time at which he heard of our successes at Cabul, he must also have heard of our humiliation in China, in a scene nearer to his own country and interests. He must have received simultaneous accounts of the fall of Ghizni, and the confiscations of the Opium, and the ignominious expulsion of our Minister from Canton. Weighing both circumstances, he has, doubtless, come to the conclusion, that our triumph in the West is a sure indication of power, than our disgrace in the East is of weakness; and he has determined to act upon this judgment.

OF EDITORIAL RESPONSIBILITY.—Our little discussion with the Hurkaru, on the extent of Editorial responsibility, we now bring to a close. Our Contemporary, after having made a general remark, that an Editor was held to adopt the sentiments of his Correspondents, when he abstained from refuting them, which general remark was calculated to fix on us, the responsibility of opinions foreign to our own, has discovered that there is no general rule without an exception. Unfortunately for us, the general rule is applied to the correspondence of the Friend; the exception is reserved for that of the Hurkaru. Our Contemporary published a letter, which charged us with venality, and venality of the deepest atrocity, because it involved the character of this great and magnanimous Government, as well as our own; and he did not refute the charge. His Correspondent, moreover, found him guilty of being suspected of a kindred venality, and this he denied. Both charges are said by the Hurkaru to have been viewed in the light of jocular remarks. We fully believe him; but how many of his readers would have discovered the concealed joke; or have supposed, after the general doctrine he had laid down, that he made an exception in our favour; and did not adopt that opinion as his own? But let that pass. We viewed the matter only as the light of a pleasantry. We thought we had caught our Contemporary tripping upon his own debatable ground. We intended, as far as it might suit that gravity, for which our Calcutta brethren are disposed to give us credit, even to be somewhat humorous; but our good Contemporary says we have taken up the matter in the spirit of our grandmother's review, the British, "who dip their pen in gall instead of honey." We intended to bring up our Contemporary to the confessional, and to lay on him a gentle stroke of the penitential crook; and he fancies we wished him to carry the faggot. So vain are all human wishes! And now with all "due solemnity," we dismiss the subject for ever, by asking him to send over his own file of correspondence during the year now about to close, and then to determine whether he is not obliged, in justice to himself, to give the exception he has now created, a very large retrospective application; in the next place we ask him to turn the exception into the rule; and, lastly, to apply it to us, and to all his other friends, as well as to his opponents; and that we may never have any occasion to revert to the subject again, we do now openly declare, in the face of mankind, that we have not been, are not, and never will be, responsible for the opinions of our Correspondents.

ANTIPATHY OF THE EDUCATION COMMITTEE TO RELIGION.

—We are found fault with by the Hurkaru for our observations last week on the necessity for Native education being taken up independently of Government. Three things were mentioned, as calculated to recommend such a course to the public. The first was the parsimony of Government in promoting education; and of that there can be but one opinion. Our Contemporary himself turns up his nose, at the liberality which allows a whole lakh of Rupees a year for the education of India. The second ground of objection we mentioned to the educational operations of Government, was, the bigotry of the Education Committee in respect of the English language as the medium of instruction; and that is as much a fact as the other. The Hurkaru, so far from denying it, seems to consider that its existence forms one of the best recommendations of the Committee. We do not quarrel with him for his opinion. Both of us are agreed as to the fact: and we consider it condemnatory of the Committee; and many more are of the same opinion. We adduced, thirdly, the antipathy of the Education Committee to religion; and for this we are charged with being reckless in our attacks, and branding the Committee "as a set of atheists or infidels." We have used no such terms. We have conveyed no such idea.

As our Contemporary observes, we strenuously uphold the principle, that, in Government Schools, instruction in the Christian religion, or attempts at religious conversion would be out of place. We cannot, therefore, blame the Education Committee for carrying out that principle. But we do blame them for volunteering, as they have on many occasions done, their interference to prevent the young men under their instruction giving any attention to the gospel. In their desire to pursue their labours, uninterrupted by the jealous fears of the Hindoos respecting the religious profession of their children, and to prevent discord, perhaps, in Native families, through the introduction of Christianity amongst them, the Committee have thought it their duty to prescribe to the pupils of their Seminaries where they shall go, or not go, during the hours which should be at their own disposal. Whatever be the motive, they have come to warn their students against Christianity, and even to prohibit their listening to its advocates, as an offence against College discipline. In such circumstances, is it possible for their pupils to escape the conviction, that the Committee do not think well of what they take so much pains to make them disregard? Hindooism is not treated so. Nor are they particular about by-gones of general scepticism gaining ground amongst the students. Although books of Christian instruction be ejected, either with contempt, or dread, from the shelves of their libraries, such works as Hume's Essays may stand there unprovoked. All this betokens, we think, an antipathy to religion, which is uneasily and injurious. Whether that antipathy be a personal feeling in the individual members of the Committee, or only an official principle, it is not for us to determine. We shall be glad to adopt the more charitable construction.

DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S DESPATCHES.—We have been favoured by the Publishers with the First Volume of the Indian Despatches of the Duke of Wellington. Mr. Douglas has, it appears, extracted from the voluminous despatches of that illustrious commander, those which refer to his campaigns in the East, and is now publishing them for the instruction of the Army in India. As we are unwilling to review a work without a careful perusal of it, we must postpone a more lengthened notice to the next week, and would now content ourselves with recommending it to the gentlemen of the army upon a general view of its contents.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 3.

—The Harker announces a report, that in consequence of the receipt of intelligence by Mr. McNaghten, Envoy at Cabul, that 25 or 30,000 Russian troops had assembled at Khiva, he had ordered the Bombay and Bengal troops, who were returning to their respective territories, to stand fast. Our own letters received this morning from the returning army at Peslawar, make no mention of any such orders, but state distinctly that Sir Willoughby Cotton was to return to Meerut.

—The conflict with the mountaineers in the Khybur Pass, is now found out not to have been so disgraceful as was at first represented. They rushed down, sword in hand, and the Sikh troops immediately took to their heels. Our own troops were severely handled; a scene of confusion ensued; five or six were killed; and ten or twenty wounded; and five hundred camels were carried off, with all the provisions and baggage they bore.

—The Englishman informs his readers, that the question of appointing Deputy Unconquered Magistrates has been referred to England to the Court of Directors;—and that there have been nearly two hundred and fifty applications for these posts.

—From the same authority we learn, that Baboo Dwaraknath Tagore, whose daughter is stated by the Rev. Mr. Malcolm to have been married to a Peer Ali, never had a daughter.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 6.

—The Mail, with intelligence from England to the 14th of October, came in this morning, at a little after one. A précis of the intelligence brought on this occasion, will be found in a subsequent column.

—By the Zenobia, which brought the Mail, we learn that the Arabs made a combined and furious attack on Aiden; but were twice gallantly repulsed by the British troops, whose artillery mowed them down by scores. These children of the desert displayed great resolution. After they had been repulsed on their first attack, finding the fire slackened, they fancied that the ammunition of the garrison was expended, and made a second charge, in which they were equally unsuccessful. They are supposed to have lost between two and three hundred men. On our side, only one man was wounded.

—The several depots of the recruits for the Regiments now serving in Afghanistan, are ordered to assemble at Ferozshah by the 10th of January next, from whence they will proceed to join their respective corps across the Indus.

—Mr. Bracken, it is said, is to be appointed Sheriff of Calcutta for the ensuing year.

—The voyage of the Zenobia Steamer has been very successful. Her average rate of steaming is stated at 8½ knots an hour. Her equalities as a Packet are superior, and she is able to take more coal on board than is necessary for the voyage to Suaz.

—Mr. Waghorn has laid the community in India under fresh obligations by his zeal and enterprise. But for his activity the Mails of the Berenice and the Water Witch, which had arrived too late for the regular Steamers, would have been detained in Egypt a month. They were stowed in no fewer than 45 cases. He made a strong representation on the subject to the Pasha, and obtained his permission to embark in one of the Egyptian Steamers with the Mails. Strange to say, the only obstacle he met with, was from the officers of the British Consulate.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7.

—Lord Auckland, with his suite, arrived at Delhi on Saturday, the 23d, and at 11 in the morning held a levee, which was numerously attended. On Monday, His Lordship attended a series of military manœuvres, which passed off with great spirit. In the evening he honoured the Assembly Rooms, in company with the Misses Eden. On Tuesday evening a play was got up, which His Lordship, family and suite attended. On Wednesday morning, shortly after day light, His Lordship left Delhi. Official information has been given to the authorities at Agra, that Lord Auckland expects to reach that city on the 14th of the present month. His Lordship will remain a fortnight, and then proceed to Gwalior, and through Jhansi, to Allahabad, where a Steamer will be waiting to receive him.

—The case of the Ranessa cerana Kistoonah Roy, the minor, was brought up in the Supreme Court yesterday. It involves property to the extent of twenty-five or thirty lakhs of Rupees, about 300,000*l*. Mr. Turton, engaged on the part of the minor, stated that he had every reason to believe the matter would be amicably settled out of Court, it being a family suit.

—The Bombay papers speak with confidence of the establishment, without delay, of studious on the Indus, which will go up the Sutledge as far as Ferozshah.

—Sir James Carnage has proceeded in person to Sattara, where the ceremony of placing the new monarch on the throne, in the room of the man whom we have deposed, was performed with all due solemnity. The scene is said by the Bombay Times to have been an imposing one, and that the pen of Emma Roberts alone was wanting to perpetuate it in undying colours. The Bombay Gazette says, the Maharattas treated the scene with contempt and cracked some very pungent jokes on the Governor and his nominee.

—Mr. Charles Prescott, of the Bagdad Civil Service, a passenger on the Zenobia from Suaz, threw himself overboard in a fit of insanity.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 9.

—Sir Jasper Nicholls was sworn in on Saturday, as Commander-in-Chief, and Member of Council, in spite of Sir Henry Fane's declaration to the Army, that he intended to keep the office in his own hands till the 1st of January next ensuing. It was Sir Henry's pleasure that Sir Jasper should be in Calcutta on the first day of the new year. Sir Jasper, however, very naturally anticipated much pleasure, on the strength of the Queen's Commission and the guns of the Port gave a very satisfactory proof of His Excellency's presence in Calcutta, on the 7th of December.

—His Honour, the Deputy Governor, gave a public entertainment to the new Commander-in-Chief, on Friday evening, at Government House, which was attended by a large body of Civil and Military Officers. By a strange oversight, the Bar and the Merchants were each represented by a solitary guest; and by a still stranger omission, one of the fourth estate, were not represented by a single unit.

—Information has been received, that a severe gale was experienced on the Coast, on the 16th of November. It did not spread as far north as Cuttack, nor does it appear as yet to have been felt as low down as Masulipatam; but at Vizagapatam and Coringa the effects were truly melancholy. A large number of craft was driven ashore, and it is said that in the neighbourhood of Coringa, the loss of life has been not far short of twenty thousand souls. Sixty Native vessels, laden with paddy, have disappeared.

—Mr. Pearson, the Advocate General, being about to proceed to the Cape of Good Hope, Government has appointed Mr. Turton to that office. We congratulate not only Government and Mr. Turton, but also the public, on the appointment. There is quite as little risk of his losing his own liberality of feeling, by serving a Government, at the head of which is Lord Auckland, as by accepting office under Lord Durham.

—The attempt to blow up the Equitable, which fourdered not long since near Fultah, has not been successful. The train did not communicate with the wreck. Unless a more successful effort can be made, this sunken vessel will materially injure the channel.

— The order for the 21st Fusiliers to go to Madras, has been countermanded. They stand fast at Chinsurah. The new European Regiment is to be assembled at Hazareebang; the 9th Foot moves on to Agra.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10.

— The Calendar of prisoners now in confinement, and to be tried at the fourth Session of the Supreme Court, comprises fifty-seven individuals, and thirty-eight cases. This number is unreasonably large, considering that the New Magistrate Act is now in force. One case we perceive is that of a felonious Cooly for having stolen a brass Lota, value ONE RUPEE TWO ANNAS. Surely the Magistrates might have settled this cause, without the aid of erudite Judges, and a Grand Jury and a Petit Jury, &c. &c. Mr. James Smith, late a resident in this town, is, we find, to take his trial for having feloniously received two notes of 11,000 Rs., being part of the sum of which the Lucknow Mail was robbed some time back.

— A letter from Bombay states, that both Admiral Maitland and Sir Henry Fane were lying dangerously ill, and that little hope was expressed of their recovery.

— The Fourth Sessions of the Supreme Court opened yesterday. Sir Edward Ryan delivered the charge to the Grand Jury, of whom five were Natives. Mr. Dampier was chosen Chairman.

— Government has, at length, resolved to supply the various treasuries in the country with Iron Chests. It is singular that a measure of such obvious necessity should have been so long delayed.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11.

— The latest accounts from Bombay state, that Sir Henry Fane and Admiral Maitland, of whose recovery little hope was entertained, were reported to be out of danger.

— The Berwick started from Bombay on the 28th November, with no fewer than 15,635 letters for Suez. There has been a steady and progressive increase in the correspondence by steam; and the last is the heaviest Mail which has started.

— Mr. W. Prinsep and Mr. Stoopford were elected Directors of the Bank of Bengal on Monday.

— The 21st Fusiliers having been ordered to remain at Chinsurah, the Enterprise Steamer has just started for Madras, without troops. She returns with ten lakhs of Rupees of treasure.

— The mountaineers in the Khybur Pass, who recently discomfited a British detachment, and carried off 500 camels, have been met by the troops sent in pursuit of them, and totally routed. Their number consisted of 1,200, and their loss was severe. On our side, two officers were wounded; one severely; and nine sepoy. A battalion of Sikhs, who were coming up in the rear, on hearing of what was going forward, halted, and remained passive spectators of the scene. Since the army began its return from Cabul, not fewer than 2,100 Camels have been lost by death or capture.

— Further accounts received, regarding the gale of Coringa, give us reason to hope, that the loss of life was not more than 5,000 souls. Property to the extent of 70,000 Rupees has been lost.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

On the 22d November, the Zenobia arrived at Bombay with news from England to the 14th, and from Paris to the 16th October. The Mail reached Calcutta last Friday morning. It brings no intelligence of very great moment.

The rumours of Her Majesty's marriage with her cousin, Prince Albert of Saxe-Cobourg, are spoken of with greater confidence in their truth. The Queen Dowager is said to have been on a visit to Windsor, with the view of effecting a reconciliation between the Queen and her illustrious Mother; but on the 7th October it is reported, that because of the continued estrangement between the Queen and her Mother, the Duchess of Kent meditates a retirement to the Continent. Her Majesty has paid off the debts of her father, the Duke of Kent, the noblest son of George the III. The King and Queen of Belgium left England on the 20th of September.

The Ministerial arrangements have been completed, by the appointment of the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay, as Secretary at War, with a seat in the Cabinet. Lord Seymour and Mr. Cley have been appointed Secretaries to the Board of Control.

The Revenue accounts are satisfactory. They shew an increase on the year ending October 10, 1858, as compared with that ending October 10, 1858, of £1,713,971. The excess on the corresponding quarter of the year is £293,222. The increase arises chiefly from the Customs, which for the year give an excess of £1,091,677. There is also an increase in the Excise of £224,383, on the year. In the Stamps there has been a decrease of £127,681, on the year.

The Earl of Lauderdale died at Dunbar, on the 13th September, in his 81st year, and is succeeded by his son, Lord Rendlesham, a clergyman, also died on the same day, in his 48d year.

The investigation of the conduct of the Birmingham Magistrates, during the late riots, has been intrusted by Government to Mr. Duval, the barrister.

The weather in the latter half of September had been very unpropitious, and the harvest had, in consequence, turned out badly, both in the United Kingdom and in France, and the adjoining Continental Countries.

Col. Pasley has succeeded in exploding a cylinder, containing 2,320 lbs. of gunpowder, against the wreck of the Royal George, by a spark from a voltaic battery communicated at a distance of 500 feet. The result appears to have been highly satisfactory. Much of her timber has been set adrift, and some of her guns have been brought up.

Rear Admiral Sir T. M. Hardy, Flag Captain of the Victory at Trafalgar, died on the 20th September. He wore, to his death, a miniature of Lord Nelson about his neck, which he had received as a present from his Lordship. According to his own directions, it was to be buried with him.

The Earl of Mount Edgcumbe died on the 26th of September, in his 71st year.

Sir Hussey Vivian, Master General of the Ordnance, has dismissed fifteen senior students from the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, as a punishment for brutal conduct towards their fags, and for general insubordinations.

Mr. Hancock's Steam Coach has made a most successful trip to Cambridge and back to London. It accomplished a mile in three minutes; and, with a heavy load, came up Royston Hill at the rate of eleven miles an hour. Mr. Brunel is reported to have succeeded in obtaining a railway speed equal to 200 miles an hour.

The Menai Bridge is undergoing a complete repair; having suffered considerable damage in the storm last winter.

On the 9th October, the Marquis of Bute was publicly entertained at Cardiff, upon which occasion the splendid docks and ship canal completed at that town, at his Lordship's expense, were opened. Both Carlisle, and the neighbouring town of Newport, have risen within these few years to eminence as seaports, for the shipment of the coal and iron of Glamorgan and Monmouth; and whilst the Marquis of Bute has given suitable docks to the former, still more extensive accommodation of the same kind is being provided for the latter, by the enterprize of its own merchants united in a Joint Stock Company.

The Marquis of Huntly is bankrupt. His debts are said to amount to £600,000; and there do not appear to be assets to the extent of 1s. 6d. in the pound. It is a failure worthy of Calcutta.

The high price of bread has caused great discontent in France; and the King appears to apprehend danger to himself. The Duke of Orleans has gone to Africa. The great pawn-broking establishment, the Mont de Pieté, which in ordinary years advances from 18 to 21 millions of francs, will this year have advanced more than 25 millions upon 1,500,000 pledges; and the returns of the Saving's Banks are equally indicative of the depressed state of trade. A treaty between France and Texas was signed in Paris on the 25th September. France recognizes the independence of the republic; and the relations between the two countries are placed on a footing of perfect reciprocity. This is helping to establish a new strong-hold of slavery. Paris papers of the 7th October state positively, that the French Government had instructed M. Pouteis to the effect, that Syria and Egypt are to be given to Maloumed Ali in hereditary sovereignty, and Candia for life.

Don Carlos has, at length, taken refuge in France, and Bourges has been assigned him for his residence by the French Government. According to the Constitutionnel he addressed a Letter to the King of the French, in which he expressed his readiness to renounce his pretensions to the throne of Spain, and to recognize the testament of Ferdinand, and the Acts of the Cortes abolishing the Salic Law, provided he was restored to his rights as an infant of Spain, which comprised title to the crown in case of the failure of the heirs of Ferdinand VII.—that his sequestered properties be given him back—and a pension suited to his rank be allowed him from Spain, with liberty to reside at Salzlurg, where his wife possesses considerable property. Louis Philippe, employed the Duke Dezares to treat with Don Carlos on the renunciation of his claims; and the National announces that Don Carlos had sent to M. Labrador, his Chargé d'Affaires, in Paris, an authorization to recognize the Queen of Spain, and for Cabrera and the Count d'Espagne to lay down their arms. The French King's next step, it is said, will be a negotiation for the marriage of the Queen of Spain with one of his sons. Cabrera is now the only rebel Chief in Spain, who refuses to submit to the Queen's Government. The Government is exhibiting a merciful spirit to its now prostrate opponents.

Attention has been greatly occupied in Portugal by the discovery of a deep laid conspiracy in favour of Don Miguel. The bitterness towards England, because of the Slave Trade Suppression Bill is unabated.

Switzerland is greatly agitated by the late proceedings at Zurich.

In the beginning of October the Great Western arrived from America, again making the passage in 12½ days. Sick-ness was prevailing extensively and fatally in the New World. Canada was still in an unsettled state. A curious capture has been made on the American Coast, of a Spanish Schooner, L'Armada, which had sailed from Havana for Cuba, with fifty-four slaves, (mostly new arrivals from Africa), a white crew, several passengers, and a cargo of dry and other goods. After being two days at sea, the Africans rose and murdered all the whites, except two of the passengers, whom they kept alive to navigate the ship. They ordered them to steer in the direction of the rising sun, the way to their homes. But what was the influence of the gulf stream, and the rising of the sun to the north of east, they fell upon the coast of America, where they were taken by some revenue cutters of the United States. The law of the case is so complicated, that the poor Africans seem likely to escape, notwithstanding their murders.

Sir John Colborne has issued a proclamation, bearing date the 24th of August, and declaring martial law no longer in force in the district of Montreal.

Sir Lionel Smith, in replying to an address presented by the Baptist Missionaries in Jamaica, on his approaching departure from the Island, gives the highest testimony to their character, and the effects of their labours. Of the state of the emancipated negroes he says, "The first year of general freedom has passed away. What were the forebodings of its enemies?—Where are the vagrants?—Where the squatters?—Where the injuries against properties, or the persons of white men? Out of the 300,000 oppressed slaves, let loose in one day to equal rights and liberty, not a human being of that mass has committed himself in any of those dreaded offences. Of his own difficulties Sir Lionel says, "Neither scurrilous abuse from the pulpit, or from the press, or repeated threats of assassination, have deterred me from doing my duty to the emancipated population. I have been more than rewarded by witnessing their sober joys in freedom." It is not surprising after this that persons of inferior station should be persecuted for befriending the Negroes. So we find it stated in an advertisement in the Patriot, that at the Assizes held at Montego Bay, in July last, various actions were brought against such persons. Amongst the victims of these proceedings were a Clergyman of the Church of England, a Missionary of the Baptist Society, and some of the Magistrates specially appointed for the protection of the Negroes. In each of these cases, the Jurors have decided against the party accused, and in most of them with enormous damages, with the evident purpose of bringing ruin upon the enemies of oppression. A liberal subscription has been begun in England to enable three parties to appeal to the Court of Error in Jamaica, and, if necessary, to the ultimate tribunal in England.

The Wesleyan Missionary Ship Triton, has sailed from Bristol for the Cape, New South Wales, New Zealand, the Feejee and the Friendly Islands with eleven Missionaries.

The Bishop of Exeter has delivered another charge, on the conclusion of which he was addressed by the Rev. Mr. Head in these terms, "My Lord, I protest against your unscriptural usurpation of apostolic authority." His protest he has since published at full length.

The Special Adjourned Meeting of the Congregational Union was held at Birmingham on the 8th, 9th and 10th of October; and a very numerous body of ministers and lay delegates attended from all parts of England. Dr. Radcliffe, of Liverpool, again presided. A series of Resolutions embodying the principles and outline of a Congregational Home Mission, were submitted to the assembly; and, after a very thorough discussion, were unanimously adopted. In reporting this event the Patriot remarks: "If indeed, there ever was a time, when it was either desirable or possible to prosecute Home Missionary efforts, without reference to distinctive views of the Christian Ministry itself, and of the discipline and liberty of Christian Churches, that time has passed. But it is not upon this ground only that the Congregational Union have resolved to conduct their Home Missionary operations upon a system more strictly denominational. The principle upon which this determination rests, is, that such efforts are the express duty of churches as such. We rejoice exceedingly in this movement, and the exhibition of the principle in which it originates. Analogous proceedings in reference to Foreign Missions cannot be much longer delayed.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint the Rev. David Welsh, D. D., to be Secretary to Her Majesty's sole and only Master Printers in Scotland, in the room of Dr. John Lee, resigned.

The Rev. W. McNulty, B. A., Trinity College, Dublin, has been refused ordination by the Bishop of Barbadoes, because his wife is a Roman Catholic. The wife of the late Bishop of Norwich was a Roman Catholic, and had in the Palace a Roman Catholic Chaplain.

The Edinburgh Presbytery of the United Associate Synod held a long and deeply interesting meeting in the beginning of October, at which nearly every member delivered his sentiments respecting the best means to be employed in obtaining a revival of religion. A Committee was appointed to put the suggestions which had been made into a practical form.

The Presbytery of Auchtermadar have appointed the Rev. Peter Morrison, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, to labour in the parish as a "Missionary," pending the decision of the case between the General Assembly and the House of Lords.

The Deputation appointed by the General Assembly to visit Palestine, being in Leghorn, on their way distributed some religious tracts, information of which was sent to Florence, whence an order came back, banishing them from Tuscany for ever. In the meantime, however, the reverend delinquents had banished themselves.

The Emperor of Russia has made short work with the Bishop of Angustowa (Poland), who in his late charge to his clergy, prohibited their sanctioning any mixed marriage, though both parties should consent to educate their children in the Catholic faith. The Bishop has at once been deposed, and deprived of his income.

The Wesleyan Centenary Fund has reached £220,000; and when the returns from the Mission Stations arrive, it is thought, it will fall little short of a quarter of a million sterling.

The Lords of the Treasury have granted Mr. Alston, of Glasgow, £400 from the Royal bounty, towards the expense of printing the Scriptures in raised letters, for the use of the blind. The New Testament and Genesis are already done, and Mr. Alston has received promises from all the blind asylums in the kingdom, except one, that they will take a number of copies.

The rumour is repeated that Lord Minto is to be the successor of Lord Auckland, as Governor General of India: but the Herkara, on the authority of a private letter, reports that Lord Howick has been offered the appointment, and will probably accept of it. We doubt not he would fill the office with honour to himself, and benefit to the country.

On the 2d October, Sir Samuel F. Whittingham, the new Commander-in-Chief at Madras, was appointed by the Court of Directors, Second Member of Council at that Presidency.

Sir Archibald Campbell having declined the appointment of Commander-in-Chief at Bombay, in consequence of ill health, Lieut. General Sir Thomas Maitland, Bart., K. C. B., has received it.

Col. Campbell, H. M. Consul General in Egypt, has been recalled at his own request, and George Lloyd Hodge, Esq., late H. M. Consul General in Servia, appointed his successor.

The Overland Mail from Calcutta to the 17th July, and Bombay the 2d August, reached London on the 21st September.

The Fernon finally sailed from Portsmouth on the 17th September: she is, therefore, rather overdue, having been now 86 days out.

The Nawab Ekbal-doo-dowlah, Prince of Oude, is visiting the chief Courts of Europe, and is expected back in England in time for the next Session of Parliament, in order to furnish Lord Brougham with a new string to harp on, in the advocacy of his claims. This is another of the hopeful connections of the British India Society; in whose proceedings the Nawab has taken a part.

Nothing farther has been done for the promotion of Steam Communication between England and India, except that all the obstacles are traced up a little more distinctly (which was scarcely necessary) to the Court of Directors, and some activity has been displayed in awakening the public attention in England to the subject. The claims of the Precursor Scheme, as we have elsewhere urged, are greatly advanced by this repetition of the disheartening intelligence that nothing is to be hoped for at home.

On the 25th September, a Quarterly General Court of Proprietors of East India Stock was held, at which there was a very interesting discussion on the connection of our Indian Government with Idolatry. It was introduced by Mr. Poynder, on the presentation of a petition from the Clergy of Bristol on the subject. He was supported by Mr. Hankey, Mr. D. Salomons, the eminent Jew, Major Oliphant, Sir Jeremiah Bryant, and Sir C. Forbes. We shall hereafter present to our readers the best report of the discussion we can find.

The East India Company's Steamers, Queen and President, with round, and Sesotris and Cleopatra, with square sterns, are to be armed with heavy metal. The three latter have been launched.

A return has been printed by order of the House of Commons of the territorial revenues and disbursements of the East India Company for the years 1835, 1836, and 1837, with an estimate of both for 1838. In the year 1835, which was that succeeding the abrogation of their Charter as a trading Company, and in which the greater part of their commercial assets were realised, there existed a surplus of income over expenditure of £8,000,000, after deducting a sum of £2,000,000, set apart for the formation of a guarantee fund for the proprietors of East India Stock. In 1836, the surplus was £2,000,000; in 1837, £2,470,000; and for 1838 the estimate of surplus is £1,300,000. The public debt of the Company at the several Presidencies, on the 1st of April, 1837, is stated at £30,400,000; and the interest on it at £1,440,000.

Mr. Trevelyan's volume, on the Education of the People of India, is reviewed in the Edinburg Review for October; it is said, by the celebrated John Foster.

No advance has been made towards a settlement of the affairs of Turkey and Egypt.

On the China question nothing has been ascertained, except that the subject is under the consideration of Government, and Lord Palmerston has suggested that shipments of goods for China must be highly inexpedient in the present posture of affairs. The Ariel is at Aden waiting for the dispatches for China, with which she is prepared to start, the instant they are received. At the October sales 2,605,000 lb. of tea were offered. The biddings were brisk, and prices still higher than before.

On the 11th November an attack was made by about 6,000 Arabs, on the British garrison at Aden. They were repulsed with considerable slaughter. Our troops had only one man killed.

The Zenobia is said to do well as a Steam Packet. She averages  $8\frac{1}{2}$  miles an hour. The Hugh Lindsay arrived at Aden on the 9th November, and proceeded on her voyage on the 12th.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India:—

WHITEFIELD'S FIELD PREACHING.—It was at a place called Hannam Mount, about three miles from this city, that the celebrated Mr. Whitefield preached his first sermon in open air; and the tree under which he then stood and proclaimed the gospel is still in existence. It is intended to hold services on the same spot of ground in the afternoon and evening of Tuesday week, the 3rd September. The following ministers have already engaged to preach on the occasion; Messrs. I. H. Roper, Thos. Winter, Evan Probert, Wm. Lacy, and John Ginnville. Should the weather be favourable, it is expected that such a season, connected as it will be with the associations of former days, will be the means of attracting a large concourse of people. At the late centenary commemoration at Stinchcombe Hill, it was considerably desirable and important to endeavour to extend the system of field preaching, and the proposed meeting at Hannam Mount is in accordance with a resolution which was then passed.—Bristol Mercury.

ASCERTAIN PUEBLEN.—“Already (in the middle of the third century) the constant and inevitable tendency of a system, essentially superstitious, to fix the attention, even of the best of men, with more solicitude, upon what is extrinsic and symbolic, than upon what is moral, spiritual, and rational, had fully developed itself in Cyprian's time.—Indeed it is the general characteristic of the early as of the later Church writers; and it is the capital article of the contrast, which so forcibly strikes us, in comparing the writings of ancient religious literature, with the Scriptures. The apostles, without condemning or forgetting that which is exterior, give all their serious cares to that which is substantial—to the weighty matter of the soul's condition, spiritual and moral. The Fathers, on the contrary, without condemning or altogether forgetting, that which is substantial, are forgetting themselves perpetually, in their modern attitudes, and clinging about that which is subsidiary only and visible—the form, the institution, the discipline, the canon—in a word, the husk of religion, fondly thinking, that so long as the rind and shell of piety could be preserved without a flaw, there could be no doubt of the preservation of the kernel. Alas! these ill-directed anxieties left the adversary, at his leisure, to perforate the shell, and to withdraw the kernel almost to the last atom? Thus our good Archbishop (Cyprian) after saying, that ‘the continence and pudicity, proper to a nun, do not consist merely in the inviolate perfection of the body,’ leads the modern reader, at least, to surmise, that he is about to recommend the inward and spiritual grace of genuine purity of heart—but no, this is not what he is thinking of. ‘True modesty, besides the integrity of the body, consists in the fair and modest attire and ornament of the person.’ Here is excellent Quakerism, as well as popery; and both sixteen hundred years old.”—Ancient Christianity.

REGLERS.—On occasion of the settlement of Mr. Statham with the Baptist church at King's-road, in this town, it had been resolved to make an effort for the liquidation of the debt remaining on the chapel, amounting to 200*l*. For this purpose a tea party of the congregation, and their friends of other denominations, was held on the 18th inst., when nearly 300 persons partook of that refreshment in the chapel, which had been modestly and even elegantly prepared for the festivity. After tea Mr. Statham presided, and was immediately supported by the Rev. Edward Hinton, of Devonshire-square, London, the former pastor; the Rev. Messrs. Lee, Rice, Woolley, and Fuller, also assisting; the Rev. Messrs. Legg, Curwen, and Laurie being by various causes denied the pleasure of attending. Various short and some deeply interesting addresses were delivered, and in about an hour it was announced that the entire sum had been contributed. The spirit which characterized the meeting throughout was eminently liberal and affectionate, and afforded a delightful omen of future peace and prosperity.—Pat.

METHODIST CENTENARY FUND.—The amount of the first instalment to this fund actually received by the General Treasurer is about 102,500*l*.—Ibid.

THE CONFERENCE.—On Tuesday week, at Brunswick chapel, Liverpool, 22 young ministers were ordered. In addressing them, the President rejoiced that “in the nobler and best sense they were in the apostolic succession,” and in addressing the congregation he said, “Good people, these are they whom we believe God wills us this day to ordain elders.” In Pitt-street chapel on Sunday afternoon nine ministers, who had been for a series of years employed in foreign stations, received an official and public recognition. The Committee of the Theological Institution presented the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted by the Conference:—“That the Committee recommend that, at least until a larger institution be erected, an additional house be procured, in the neighbourhood of London, with a design to form a preparatory branch; and that the Rev. John Farrar be appointed tutor and governor.” The case of the Rev. T. Galland, M. A., who had published a letter to refuse to the scheme of Normal Education, came before the Conference in the form of a complaint that he had infringed the rules and usages of the body. Mr. Galland made such explanations as were satisfactory to the Conference, and precluded the necessity of prosecuting the question. Several ministers have been compelled partially to retire from the scenes of ministerial activity and toil. We subjoin a list of their names:—F. Derry, R. Morton, C. C. Hulme, R. Melson, J. Meek, W. M'Nair, J. Russell, 1st, H. Casen, In Ireland, Messrs. D. West, M'Corrick, and Burrows. It was unanimously resolved, that the next Conference shall be held at Newcastle-upon-Tyne.—Christ. Adv.

EDUCATION.

THE FIREBIRD is a seminary of infinite importance. It is important because it is universal, and because the education it bestows, being woven in with the roof of childhood, gives form and colour to the whole texture of life. There are few who can receive the honours of a college, but all are graduates of the hearth.—Fire-side Education.

LONDON UNIVERSITY.—Lord BROUGHAM is moving for copies of the charter of the London University, and the charter of the University College, (London,) said he had come to the resolution of giving up the subject of education to his noble friend at the head of the Government. He hoped his noble friend would apply to his vigorous and manly understanding, and give it the benefit of all the resources which he would derive from his situation, and from the assistance of those who supported him in that House. It was needless to say with what cordial affection he should greet his noble friend's entrance upon such a course, or with what feelings his bosom would be filled when he beheld his noble friend taking a part which would enoble his Government with a glory that would never fade. (Here the noble and learned Lord was visibly affected.) However desirable it might be to see established a plan of national education, in which the Church of England should have no pre-eminence, such a plan was utterly impracticable. Rightly or wrongly—for that was quite another question—our whole system of civil ecclesiastical polity gave de jure as well as de facto, a prerogative to the Established Church. On this principle he had proceeded in 1819 and in 1820, when he recognized the pre-eminence of the Church of England by proposing twigs to the parish priest a veto upon the appointment of schoolmasters. Dissenters met him in consultation upon the question; they candidly told him their objections, soundly propounded their principles, and consistently urged their claims. Among all those whom he had met he had made but one convert—that convert was worthy, not only of all honour, but of all love, of all reverence, of all veneration, in the eyes of every one of his pupils—of his flock—nay, of his fellow-countrymen—he meant the Rev. Dr. Lyndsay, who expressed himself to him (Lord Brougham) in these words:—“My friend, I hate Episcopacy, and I detest Papacy; but rather than the children of this country should be lost here and perished hereafter by remaining in ignorance, I would suffer, not only to be taught, but to be the Pope of Rome himself.” These were the last words uttered by that venerable man on the subject, for he died suddenly the very next day, leaving to his faithful this strong memorial of his good sense, his liberality, and his universal philanthropy. The difficulties which stood in the way of a system of national education, arose from a feeling which it was mortifying and humbling to think upon, but which prevailed equally among the teaching and the dissenting. Churchmen had done much for the cause of education; and Dissenters had done much for the cause of education—both prized it highly, respected it deeply, and loved it dearly; but yet such was human frailty—such was the weakness of our imperfect nature, even when we were seeking the best objects, and were animated by the purest and holiest feelings, that there was one thing which both Dissenters and Churchmen prized; still more highly, and which they loved still more dearly, and that was—Victory. Churchmen desired to see the people instructed, but they desired still more to keep down the Dissenters. The Dissenters wished for national education, but wished a little more to pull down the Established Church. It was owing to the existence of these feelings that the interests of education appeared to have failed hopelessly prostrate. But there was still hope if the Government would introduce a measure founded upon Catholic principles: he was ready to take his share of the unpopularity which would arise from giving a predominance to the Established Church in a system of national education; and, what was still more important, those with whom he acted on this question, and who had much more influence than himself, were ready to take their share of that unpopularity.—*Christ. #### SCIENTIFIC.

FALLING STARS.—During the night of Friday and Saturday last, the 9th and 10th August, the heavens were strewn with little falling stars of extraordinary brightness. Mr. Forster counted above 600 of them. It is not a little singular that the peasants of Franconia, and Saxony, have believed for ages past, that Saint Lawrence weeps tears of fire which fall from the sky every year on his fête (the 10th August). This ancient popular German tradition, on observation, has been found within these few years to be a fact, which engages the attention of astronomers. The inhabitants of Brussels can bear witness that in the night of the 10th this year Saint Lawrence shed abundance of tears.—Brussels Paper.

A NEW COMET.—The following notice of a new comet, visible only through the telescope, is given by the Notizie del Giornale, of Rome, of the 16th inst.—“It first appeared in the tail of the dragon, and may not be seen between the stars Kappa and Lambda. When discovered on the 14th it was confounded with a nebula, extremely weak, and it will be in vain to search for the comet until this nebula has been made out.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.—Birmingham, Tuesday.—The first general meeting of the members was held this evening, at the magnificent and capacious Town-hall. The Rev. W. V. Hickson, president, in the chair. The Marquis of Northampton and Earl Dartmouth, the two vice-presidents, took the chair soon after eight o'clock. The president opened the proceedings with an elegant address.

TUESDAY.—The first paper read was a memoir from Dr. Ure, on the elastic force and density of steam, which he had undertaken, at the request of the association. In the course of his observations, he regretted that chemists in this country did not substitute Besançon's thermometer for that of Fahrenheit, as the divisions of the latter were very inaccurate.—2. Mr. Hodgkinson related the result of his experiments on the power of different species of wood to resist a force tending to crush them. The results showed that the strength depended materially on the degree of dryness of the different kinds of wood which were subjected to experiment, and which would prove of considerable practical interest to builders. It was suggested that similar experiments should be made with respect to the quantity of water lost in drying and the effect of steaming wood.—3. A communication was next made from Mr. Fairbairn on his experiments on the tension of iron which were in progress. In all the bars there was a constant increase in the deflection, rendering it very probable that time only was necessary to break the whole of them, though in some of them the power must be great; but as yet nothing certain could be predicted.—4. Mr. Cotton exhibited a brick and tile-making machine, invented by the Marquis of Tweeddale, which possessed some very peculiar advantages. The importance of obtaining bricks more perfect and with greater economy had been proved by the efforts made upon the subject; but as yet, although nearly thirty patents had been taken out on the subject, none had been successful. In this machine the clay was carried under the rollers in a compressed state, as an engine, and was cut by the action of a scraper, which had but to be carried away to be baked. One revolution of the machine, which took one minute, produced thirty bricks, and one man and two boys were able to produce 30,000 bricks in a working day.

Section F.—Statistics.—Mr. Rawson read a document, entitled an Inquiry into the Criminal Statistics of England and Wales. The average number of persons committed or bailed to take their trial before the quarter sessions, assizes, and local courts, between England and Wales proper, the five years, was 22,174. The variation between the highest and lowest annual numbers during the period was 143 per cent. There was a considerable decrease in the number of commitments in 1825 and 1826, compared with 1821, amounting in the average of these two years to 8 per cent.; while in 1827 and 1828 there was an average increase of 4 per cent. compared with the two intermediate years; but the probability of remark, that the variation was only slight in the two sexes. The decrease in 1835 and 1836 occurred entirely amongst the male sex, for the number of female commitments slightly increased, and the increase in 1827 and 1828 was more than four times as great amongst the females as the males. Malignant offences against property have decreased 36 per cent., whilst offences against property, with violence, have increased seven per cent.

and against property, without violence, together with fugery and offences against the currency, have increased 19 per cent. The various subjects were classified in detail, and the paper excited considerable discussion.

We regret not having space for an account of the other papers that were read.

MISCELLANEOUS.

LIBERATION OF THE COURTNEY RIOTERS.—Fond, Foreman, Griggs and Wright have been released from Maidstone goal, where they were imprisoned for their share in the lamentable Courtney riots at Bough-on-the-Hill last year. They have signed and published a declaration expressive of their regret for their folly and delusion in that unfortunate affair, and acknowledging the justice of their sentence and punishment.—Put.

A CHAISTIST CHAPEL.—A room has been licensed at Trowbridge as a place of “religious worship” for the Chaists, on the door of which is printed “Democratic Chapel.”—Wilt Gazette.

THE REV. MR. STEPHENS was tried on Thursday at Chester assizes, for having spoken seditious on the 14th of November at Hyde. There were two other counts varying the charge in the indictment—one charging the defendant with riot, and the other with being present at an unlawful assembly. Witnesses were examined at great length in support of the charge. The prisoner addressed the jury: he spoke for five hours, but called no witnesses. The jury, after deliberating for a few minutes, returned a verdict of guilty.—The learned judge then, after complimenting the defendant on the talent and ability with which he had conducted his defence, and (says the Morning Post) regretting the duty the law imposed upon him, sentenced the rev. gentleman to eighteen months' imprisonment in the goal of Knutford. Mr. Stephens then applied to the court for permission to have the use of writing materials. The Attorney-General had no objection in the part of the Crown, as it was his wish to make Mr. Stephens's imprisonment more unpleasant or oppressive than could be avoided. Mr. Stephens then withdrew in the custody of the officers. The trial did not terminate till nearly nine o'clock.—Mr. Blundell, who was tried for forgery on Sir Thomas Stanley and acquitted, was on Thursday found guilty of embezzlement, and sentenced to fifteen years' transportation.—Christ. Adv.

THE CHAISTIST DIVISION is almost over. We do not mean that the political principles of Chaists are, or are likely to be, extinct. But the brief career of violence draws towards its close. The hot-headed, or false-hearted leaders, by whose cowardly councils it was instigated, had evidently little hold on the great body of working men, or Ultra-Radical politicians. Ministers have obtained whatever they asked from Parliament for the preservation of the public peace. So far as that purpose was concerned, their hands have been strengthened by all parties. Nor have they been thwarted by juries: every material conviction which they sought for they have obtained. They have been strong enough and wise enough to bleed mercy with justice. Some local outbreaks may yet exhibit the struggles of the exasperated spirit of delusion, but substantially it is quelled. And this has been accomplished by the repression of violence, not the suppression of political opinion. The condition of Chaism offers no excuse for postponing the mention of political or social reforms. It presents every inducement for a Government to display its purposes, and to prepare itself for their realisation.—Morning Chronicle.

THE PROPOSED MODEL PRISON.—It is reported that negotiations are on foot for the purchase of a piece of ground at Barnaby Park, Islington, on which is to be erected the new Government model prison. The sight is near Copenhagen-house, with a cold bleak atmosphere and a deep clay soil, which renders the ground generally damp; but, standing upon a hill, it is capable of effectual drainage.—Put.

A STRONG DRINK, MURDER, AND THE GALLOW'S.—Yesterday morning the extreme sentence of the law was carried into effect at St. Ann's Garrison, upon the person of Corporal Patrick Gleeson, of the 36th Regiment, who was convicted at the late Sessions of the wilful murder of Acting Sergeant Major Fletcher, of the same regiment. At a quarter after ten o'clock a square was formed around the gallows, composed of a detachment of the 36th and the regiments in garrison. At 20 minutes to 11 o'clock the criminal arrived at the foot of the gallows, accompanied by his spiritual adviser, the Rev.—Mr. Rogers, Rector of St. Patrick's, and surrounded by the mounted and foot police. A gloomy stillness now pervaded the vast multitude of spectators, and the soldiers seemed deeply affected. After an interval of about ten minutes spent in prayer, the unhappy man pulled off his boots, lowered the green cravat from his neck, bound his head with it and ascended the drop. There was not the slightest allusion in his countenance from what he exhibited in the Court House durby his trial; the same settled calmness and apparent resignation. The rope having been adjusted, he proceeded to address the soldiers around him in substance as follows:—

"Brother soldiers and comrades, take warning by my example; listen to my dying words—abstain from drinking intoxicating liquors, for that has brought me to this untimely end. A report was in circulation that a conspiracy to take the life of the sergeant existed with two or three men of the company, and that I was the leader. With my dying breath I assure you there was no such thing; no mortal knew my intention; it was known to myself alone and to my God, in whose awful presence I shall soon be, I pray you all to forgive me. I have no wish to blame but myself, and the use of strong drink."

During the delivery of this address, which he made in a strong and clear voice, the conflict was indeed terrible; his bosom heaved frightfully, and twice he raised his eyes to Heaven and gasped for breath. After concluding the last words of his address, the drop fell, and after three slight convulsive struggles it was all over! He was not blind-folded, and we are told that green being the colour of his regiment, was the cause of his binding his head with a green handkerchief.—Barbadoes Liberal, June 28.

NEW MODES OF RESURRECTION.—Dr. Fowler.—At the annual meeting of the Bristol Hygiene Society, on Tuesday, the Society's silver medal was presented to Dr. Fairbairn, of Clifton, for his exertions in recovering a boy who had been under the water in the floating harbour a quarter of an hour, and another quarter of an hour had elapsed before the Doctor could operate upon the body. The most remarkable feature in this case is the new mode by which Dr. Fairbairn succeeded in his laudable object; by closing the mouth with his finger, sucking off the foul air from the lungs through the nostrils and promoting respiration by pressing on the abdominal muscles on the sides. The usual method is to inflate the lungs, but it is very seldom that persons are recovered by this method if they have been longer than a few minutes under water.—Worcester Journal.

HOW TO ESCAPE HANGING.—In the course of an inquest held before Mr. Wakley, the body of a man who had cut his throat, a juror expressed his surprise, that the blood had not suffocated him the instant after the act. The Coroner said that when persons severed the wind-pipe the blood scarcely ever went down. On the contrary, the windpipe being open caused a person to breathe freely until nearly all the blood had gone from their bodies. It was a common practice, where persons were affected with stoppage, to cut into the neck, the windpipe below the seat of the disease, to enable them to breathe freely. In fact, it had been known, both in this and other countries, that men who had been hanging enough to open their own throats below the place where the rope was adjusted. The consequence had been, that, after hanging upwards of an hour, they were delivered over to their friends, who by attention frequently recovered them.—Christie Ad.

KNOWLEDGE IS POWER.—At a meeting which took place the other evenings for the purpose of forming a North London Mechanics' Institution, Mr. Emil Montague, as an illustration of the maxim that knowledge is power, related the following anecdote:—He was walking a few months ago in Portland-place, when he observed a large crowd of people assembled, and found that it was in consequence of a large mastiff dog having a loose yoke in his gripe. Several persons tried by splitting the mastiff's ears, and by biting and plucking in tail, to make it let go his hold, but in vain. At last a delicate and dandified young gentleman came up, and making his way through the crowd into the circle, requested to be allowed to separate the dogs; assent was given and jaws and laughter, when the dandy slowly drew from his pocket a large snuff-box, and having opened it, he pinched himself in the fingers again into the box, and withdrawing a larger pinch, deliberately applied it to the mastiff's nose. The snuff operated so powerfully on the animal's olfactory nerves, that it not only immediately let go his hold, but made its escape as fast as it could. The dandy was loudly cheered, upon which he stopped for a moment, and said, "Gentlemen, I have merited, given you a proof that 'knowledge is power.'"Pat.

The Duke of Wellington took part in the debate respecting the Government patronage of idolatry in India, that soldiers ought not to be very nice in matters of conscience; and, in fact, religious scruples have never met with favourable consideration at the Horse Guards, where Toryism reigns paramount. When the late Rev. Mr. Latrobe was in Cape Town, during the administration of that punk of Tory governors, Lord Charles Somerset, sent some expressions of disapproval on the part of his Lordship towards the Missionaries, and the worthy Moravian clergyman to remark in pleasant, that he wondered His Excellency should speak against Dissenters, as he was himself instrumental in making Dissenters by wholesale. Lord Charles, surprised at the startling assertion, asked the reverend gentleman to explain himself, protesting that he hated Dissenters like the devil. Mr. Latrobe replied, that, in making the speech, a Scotch regiment attended the Church. His Lordship was overruling good Church of Scotland men into Episcopallians, who were Dissenters in Scotland. Upon which His Excellency laughed and said, "Mr. La-troupe, you do not understand these matters. Every man, on touching the King's money, becomes a Church of England man." Such is, we believe, the prevailing Tory doctrine.—Ibid.

OLD LEGISLATION.—An antiquarian friend has directed our attention to the following extract from an Act of the Scottish Parliament, passed in the reign of Queen Margaret, 1284; we do not know whether he wishes it to be re-enacted, and to have full effect during the reign of our present Sovereign Lady Queen Victoria:—"It is statuit and ordainit, that the first rate pair of best must blinit Majestie, ilk maiden ladye, of both hiegh and lowe estate, sall have liberte to bespeke ye man she lykis; albeit, gif he refuses to tak hir till he is his wif, he sall be mulet in ye summe of ane hundredth punde, or less, as his estate may be; exceptie and always gif he can mak it appear that he is betrouthit to ane ither woman, that then he sall be free."—Dundas, Popes.

MARRIAGE.—RAILROAD AWEKWARD AGAIN.—A few days ago a happy couple, members of two highly respectable families in the neighbourhood, were joined in wedlock, at the old church, Wandsworth, and the bride and bridegroom having fixed on Southampton as the place for spending the "honey moon," carriages were in attendance to convey them and their friends to the nearest station on the Southampton line of railway, as soon as the ceremony was completed. On the arrival of the train at the station, the bride was placed in one of the first rate carriages, and the luggage deposited in a proper place of security, but while the bridegroom (M. D.) was taking leave of a number of friends who had accompanied him to the spot, the conductor gave the word "all right, go on," the engineers turned on the steam, and in an instant the train shot off at so rapid a rate as to be out of sight. The feeling of the gentleman, being deprived of his bride so soon, may be more easily conceived than described. The emergency seemed naturally to perplex him much, but he at length determined on "posting" it to Southampton, and four horses were at once put to one of the carriages, and the vehicle was driven off at a pace little short of railroad speed.—Pat.

ROSE AMATEURS are, on the watch for the slightest differences. This rose is remarkable for its speed, the other for its thorns; one is remarkable for the absence of some beauty; a second, reflects all its value from not having the slightest odour; and there is another which would lose nearly all its importance if it did not give forth a slight smell of pine. The more a plant departs from the common rose the more it is esteemed by zealous amateurs. Happy man would he who possessed a rose that produced grapes, and who could drink the wine of his roses. We have seen a rose-tree, the possessor of which explains that for five years, since he obtained it from seed, it has never flowered. Fortunate mortal! more fortunate still if next year he can boast that it produces not a leaf!—Ibid.

ACCIDENT AT A LUCIFER MANUFACTORY.—At about noon yesterday, the neighbourhood of Queen-street, Finsbury, was greatly alarmed by a loud explosion at the Lucifer Match-manufactory in the street, the windows of which were completely demolished and driven out by the force of the concussion. Mr. Forth, the proprietor of the place, had been sitting together some of the combustible ingredients used in the business, when they ignited and blew him back in a ditch of insensibility. Upon the arrival of assistance, he presented a shocking appearance, the flesh having been torn from his face in several places, his eyes closed up, and their sight it is feared irrecoverably lost. He has just recovered from the effects of a similar disaster that took place a few weeks ago. In consequence of the repeatedly recurring accident at the manufactory, one of which not long since set fire to the place, and from the inflammable nature of the stock, the inhabitants have prepared a memorial to the magistrate of the district, praying them to put a stop to the "perilous trade." In answer to a similar application some time back, the magistrates stated that they had no power to interfere.—Ibid.

ATTENDING A RECRUIT.—On Monday a bouché, fresh from the spade, was brought before the sitting magistrate at the Police-office, Cork, to be attested to serve in the East India Company's Service, when the following colloquy ensued between him and the magistrate. Bench: Are you willing to serve in her Majesty's East India Company's Service? Recruit: I am, Sir.—Bench: Now you are going to swear, and repeat what I say to you.—Recruit: Repeat what you say, Sir.—Bench: Repeat after me.—Recruit: Repeat after me, Sir.—Bench: Ah you stupid fellow.—Recruit: Ah you stupid fellow, Sir.—(Laughter.)—Bench: Be silent and listen to me. Recruit: Be silent and listen to me, Sir.—Bench: Mind your oath.—Recruit: Mind your oath, Sir.—Bench: Oh dear, oh dear! I will you listen to me? Recruit: Oh dear, oh dear! I will you listen to me, Sir? (Loud laughter.)—Bench: Did you ever see such a fellow?—Recruit: Did you ever see such a fellow, Sir.—(Immense laughter.)—Bench: Listen to me, and be quiet.—Recruit: Listen to me and be quiet, Sir.—Bench: Take him out of that, I have no patience with him, Sir.—(Roars of laughter.)—The recruit was here removed by a policeman, who, after drilling him for some time, reproduced him to his worship, and having properly gone through the formalities, was eventually sworn in.—Cork Constitution.

THE WALKING WALLS.—Individuals who agree to perambulate the streets of London, enclosed between two boards, each containing advertisements. The spectacle of a man consenting to be labelled for the good of his country, was such a new feature in the moral world, as could not fail to draw great attention. Every body gazed with wonder and respect on the boarded being, as he walked gravely and solemnly along the streets, saying nothing, and yet so eloquent all over—

"One would have almost said his body thought—" looking as if he were quite unconscious of any thing particular, and yet practising a silent ventriloquism all the time—readable also in the rear, like a book telling a great deal in the back-stile, and taking care every now and then to turn and walk in a different direction, so that he might be perused on both sides. A few might smile; but he was armed in proof against raillery, and, like an ancient knight in the tilt-yard, might have even been thrown down and trodden upon without suffering much inconvenience. The wits let fly many shafts at him. He was likened to the mummy or walking leaf, and people talked of his back as his second page. He was said to be a new kind of herald, who had dismissed the trumpet and voice, and resolved to give his proclamations on the tabard. When his placards were changed, he was said to have been put to press and brought out in a new edition. A typographical error being pointed out to him, he was said to be, what few men liked to consider themselves, liable to correction. Another wag instituted a comparison between his trade and that of certain journalists, who, in the neighbourhood of his principality walk. Our walking placard, said he, lets out his body at so much a day, for the purpose of asserting a few highly questionable facts about genuine tea, matchless cigars, and what not. In like manner, the journalist of the kind hinted at, lets out his brain to detail, daily or weekly, all the dubious facts and malicious party slanders and sarcasms which it may please his employers to circulate. The gentleman levitated in advertisements in the same manner as those things he advertised, walking with equal satisfaction under the vegetable medicines which are sure to destroy his fellow-creatures, and the cheap gentleman's apparel, which his infelicitably is worth all it costs. So is the other gentleman, quite as ready to give proper literary shape to the calumnies of one party as to the calumnies of another. In the one case, it is a back and front which does the work; in the other, it is a back and front which does the work; in the two trades—excepting perhaps that the gentleman mailed in boards, and posted with placards, is probably able to set up his face a great deal more confidently for what he is about, than would be the gentleman of the Mail or Post, or whatever other name they may delight in.—Chambers's Journal.

MARCYCATHETIC FORTALE.—The manner of extracting pitch from ree-weed, and following a sufficient quantity of kelp has been collected, it is spread out in a place where it will be dried by the sun and wind, and when dry enough to burn, a hollow is dug in the ground three or four feet wide; round its margin are laid stones, on which the weed is placed and set on fire. Quantities of this fuel being continually heaped upon the circle, there is in the centre a soft flame, from which a liquid substance like melted metal drops into the hollow beneath. This substance is worked off stirred with iron rakes, and brought into a uniform consistence while in a state of fusion; and when cool it consolidates into a heavy, dark-coloured alkaline substance, which undergoes in the glass-house a second vitrification, and then assumes a perfect transparency.—Narrative of the Surveying Voyages of H. M. ships Adventure and Beagle.

ARTIFICIAL IVORY.—Certain parties in Sheffield have just obtained a patent for the making of a substance so nearly resembling ivory, and so applicable to the making of valuable materials that it is almost impossible to detect the difference. We have not ourselves seen the mock ivory, but we are told that, in one instance, a working cutler had a quantity of scuffs given out to him, consisting partly of the fictitious compound, and partly of ivory, and that he used them in hating his knives, and returned his work without discovering the difference. We understand that an imitation tortoiseshell is prepared and used, which, for some purposes, is little inferior to some varieties of the real article. It may be expected, therefore, that the quadruped and the reptile, for which our artists have hitherto been indebted for the precious substances above named, will henceforth be "left alone in their glory," the former of his tusks and the latter of his entrails.—Sheffield Iris.

MEDICAL ADVERTISING.—A physician enjoying an extensive practice in a western county advises that he has removed from his old residence to a new house within a few doors of the churchyard, and expresses a hope that his removal will prove an accommodation to many of his patients.—Pat.

PERMANENT VALUE OF KNOWLEDGE.—One of the most agreeable consequences of knowledge, is the respect and importance which it communicates to old age. Men rise in character often as they increase in years; they are venerated from what they have acquired, and pleasing from what they can impart. If they outlive their faculties, the more frame itself is respected for what it once contained; but women (such is their unfortunate state of education) hazard every thing upon one cast of the die; when youth is gone, all is gone! No human creature gives his admiration for nothing; either the eye must be charmed, or the understanding gratified. A woman must talk wisely or look well. Every human being must put up with the coldest civility, who has neither the charms of youth nor the wisdom of age. Neither is there the slightest commiseration for decayed accomplishments; no man mourns over the fragments of a dancer, or drops a tear on the relics of musical skill. They are flowers destined to perish; but the decay of great talents is always the subject of solemn pity; and even when their last memorial is over, their ruins and vestiges are regarded with pious affection.—Rev. Sidney Smith.

CHILDREN.—Call not that man wretched, who, whatever else he suffers as to pain inflicted, or pleasure denied, has a child for whom he hopes, and on whom he dotes. Poverty may grind him to the dust, obscurity may cast its darkest mantle over him, the song of the gay may be far from his own dwelling, his face may be unknown to his neighbours, and his voice may be unheeded by those among whom he dwells—even pain may rack his joints, and sleep may flee from his pillow—but he has a gem, with which he would not part for wealth defying computation, for fame filling a world's ear, for the luxury of the highest health, or for the sweetest sleep that ever sat upon a mortal's eye.—Coleridge.

THE LATE DUKE OF NAUSSAU.—Duke William George Augustus of Nassau, was born on the 29th of June, 1792, and succeeded his father Prince Frederick William of Nassau-Weilburg, on the 9th of January, 1816; and by the death of Duke Frederick Augustus, the last of the line of Nassau-Ussegen, on the 24th of March, 1816, Duke William succeeded to all the country of the eldest branch (Walraimenne) of the house of Nassau, which already formed, in 1806, a duchy. The late Duke was formerly general of cavalry in the Russian service. The Duke was twice married; first, 24th of June, 1813, to Charlotte Louise Frederica Amelia, daughter of the deceased Duke Frederick of Saxe-Altenburg; and, secondly, to the Princess Pauline of Wurtemberg, daughter of Prince Paul of Wurtemberg. Duke William had four children, two male and two female, by his first marriage; and one son, and two daughters by his second wife. The heir apparent (Duke Adolphus William) was born the 14th of July, 1817. He passed through Frankfurt with his brother Prince Maurice, on their way to Biberich, where the Dowager Duchess was staying. The reigning Duke, in his official announcement of the death of his father and his accession to the sovereignty says,—"We will use all the efforts in our power to promote the prosperity of the country, to maintain the constitution, and to exercise the interest of all classes, the rights of sovereignty which have been transmitted to us." A general mourning of six months has been ordered throughout the duchy.—Pat.

MEMOIRS ALI IN HIS FAMILY.—Of the sons of Mahomet Ali, Tousseou, the second, was long the favourite. He was a generous, not to say extravagant disposition; and when, on one occasion, he was reproached by his father for his prodigality, he answered, "It may be well for you to be economical, who were not born what you are; but I am the son of Mahomet Ali Pacha, and the son of a Pacha must be liberal." His father smiled, his answer flattered his sense of dignity, and he upbraided Tousseou no more. Not long after Tousseou died of the plague. A third son, Ismail, was murdered by the blacks in Senaar, the but in which he was being surrounded by brushwood, set on fire, and he perished in the flames. * * "I have been very happy in my children," he said to me one day; "there is not one of them who does not treat me with the utmost deference and respect; except he added laughing outright, thus little fellow, a few years the least of all, Mahomet Ali." He was then a boy of five or six years old, called by his father's name—the son of his old age—his Benjamin—his best beloved. "I see how it is," I said; "your Highness spoils the boy. You encourage the little rogue." Mahomet Ali laughed again—it was an acknowledgement of a little parental weakness. Not long after I was in the palace of Shoubra—it was on a Friday, the 21st of September, when the Pacha is in the habit of receiving his family. I found him in the centre of his Divan. He was surrounded by all his sons and grandsons who were then residing at Cairo. He had been listening to the accounts of their studies, of their amusements, and their employments. Abbas Pacha, the eldest son of Tousseou Pacha, sat next his grandfather, and the rest of the family were seated on chairs, according to their ranks and ages. A few were conversing with him, and he was smiling at them; but he was now withdrawn. One after another they rose, knelt before him, kissed the hem of his garment, and retired. Little Mahomet Ali came last; he was dressed in military costume, with a small gold-encased scimitar dangling at his side. He advanced towards his father—looked in his face; he saw the accustomed, the voluntary smile; and, when he was about a yard from the Pacha, instead of kneeling or saluting him, he turned, and, like a child, amusingly scampered away. "What a young colt," I heard him say. "I said I to Mahomet Ali. The old man shook his head—looked grave for a moment—another smile passed over his countenance—"Fehl, pehl!" said he, in a low tone. "Well, well!"

But, I certainly did not like his Highness the worse for what I had just witnessed.—Morning's Minor Morals.

THE OLDEST TOWN IN THE UNITED STATES, by more than 40 years, is St. Augustine, Florida. It was founded 40 years before Virginia was colonised. Some of the houses are yet standing which are said to have been built more than three centuries ago.—Pat.

EARLY RISING.—Some people have an idea that early rising is better than late rising. It is a false idea altogether. Early rising puts a colour into the cheek, to be sure, and elasticity in the step. But what of that? It makes you strong, beautiful, and gay-cheeked, and gives you many a long year to live. Not for that, early rising is decidedly vulgar, merely mechanical—and only suited to the common people, who have to exert their muscles before they eat them. We like to see people lie a-bed till ten o'clock at least—especially the women. We admire a woman who sleeps till ten, and then gets up with a pale face and fevered pulse—it looks so genteel.—American Paper.

AMERICAN RAILROADS.—From the following (copied from the National Intelligencer), it appears that the Americans, in rail-road arrangements, go pretty considerably a-head of us poor Europeans. The train between New York and Baltimore, has two cars fitted up in a splendid manner for the use of the ladies, and such gentlemen as have ladies in charge. These cars are elegantly curtained, carpeted, and adorned with costly mirrors; and at the ends of each of the cars, opening into them, is a magnificent sanctum sanctorum, for the exclusive use of the ladies, in addition to which a stewardess is appointed to wait upon them. The other carriages (we are informed) are so adapted as to communicate with each other, forming a continuous promenade through the whole, with seats on the sides for occasional resting.—Pat.

AMERICAN SLAVERY.—The soreness which the Americans have hitherto exhibited on all matters connected with the extinction or amelioration of slavery, appears to be wearing away, and giving place to more elevated feelings. Mr. Soule, well known in England as the persevering and resolute friend of the African race, addressed a numerous meeting at Newhaven on the working of the new system in the West Indies. Instead of being "lynched," or having to fly the town in order to save his life, like some of his predecessors, he was listened to by a highly respectable meeting upwards of two hours. At the close, a distinguished American, Professor Stillman, proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Soule; and after having been seconded by Judge Daggett, it passed unanimously. That dark spot, on Soule's career, slavery, might be speedily wiped away if reason and argument were substituted for the violent and disgraceful treatment which have hitherto accompanied the steps of all persons in the United States who have expressed opinions unfavourable to its continuance.—Courier.

JUSTICE IN FLORIDA.—We take the following from the Apalachicola Gazette where it was conspicuously inserted, and so marked as to excite special attention. Is not Florida indeed the home of the oppressor?

Extract of an ordinance for the purpose of raising a revenue, for use of the city of Apalachicola for the year 1839.

Article 11. Upon every person of colour, the sum of twenty dollars.

Article 12. Upon each and every slave who hires his own time, and is not under the immediate control of a master, who shall have resided thirty days within the same corporation, the sum of one hundred dollars.

Those included in the above sections will take notice, that if they are not complied with on or before Saturday next, they will be sold to the bidder that will pay their taxes for the shortest term of service.

J. ENDREAN, Tax Collector.

August 30, 1838.

On another page we find the ordinance entire, of which this extract was deemed worthy of such particular distinction. The 10th article stands thus:—

"Upon each and every white male inhabitant over the age of twenty years, who shall have resided within the corporate limits of the town for more than thirty days, the sum of two dollars."

What can be the design of such an ordinance as this? Can it be to raise a revenue? No, it is to sell every free person of colour back again into slavery, and to crush the incipient effort of the poor slave for freedom. It is hard to believe the evidence of our senses, that such facts as these exist in enlightened Christian America at this day. Such combinations of the strong against the weak? Such utter disregard of justice.

From the same ordinance we trace out still farther their ideas of justice, and policy. "Upon each and every theatrical performance, twenty dollars." From which we know not what inference to draw, except that, in the opinion of these lawgivers, if a slave should hire his time so as not to be under the immediate control of a master, it would be as great an injury to the city of Apalachicola as five theatres.

Again: "Upon every bar-room or grocery, including license, fifty-three dollars." That is, a heartless liquor-seller may be duly licensed to poison the public morals, and scatter misery and crime for half what a poor man must pay for the pitiful privilege of hiring his time of his master. Surely oppression is its own punisher.—Boston Christian Advertiser.

FOUR CELEBRITIES.—At the distribution of prizes in the Royal College of Orleans, which took place a few days since, Count Simcoe, the senior member of the Chamber of Peers, who was present at the ceremony, with his son, Viscount Simcoe, Peer of France, and his grandson, M. Simcoe, Prefect of the Loiret, put the prize-wreath on the head of his great grandson, the young Edgar Simcoe, a pupil of the sixth class.—Pat.

JAMAICA.—We promised to lay before our readers a specimen of Mr. Borge's method of meeting the charges which had been brought against the Jamaica Assembly in the columns of the Morning Chronicle. We now redeem that promise; and our readers will be enabled, from this specimen, to form a correct estimate of the wily agent's aptitude at evasion and equivocation, and the cool effrontery with which he can thrust himself personally forward to contradict the most palpable and notorious misstatements of fact.

STATEMENT IN THE "MORNING CHRONICLE."—"Almost all the expenditure for educational purposes is contributed from parliamentary funds, in aid of the funds of charitable societies in this country."

MR. BERGE'S REPLY.—"This is not true, and is answered below."

REMARKS BY ED. OF "COL. REF."—"This is a very summary method of disposing of the question, but let us see how matters stand."

"The number of children instructed in establishments supported by parliamentary grants, and by contributions of charitable bodies and private individuals at home, is, we believe, as follows:—"

Church of England, .....	10,415
Baptist Missionaries, .....	4,725
African Charity, .....	5,330
Presbyterian Seceders, .....	2,819
Wesleyans, .....	1,433
London Missionary Society, .....	1,113
Moravians, .....	1,284

Total, .....

"The number instructed in schools supported by grants from the House of Assembly:—"

Church of Scotland at Falmouth, .....	289
Church of Scotland at Kingston, we believe, about .....	400

Total, .....

"These may be said to be supported by annual grants from the Assembly. But let us not forget, in justice to the Honourable House, that, in 1837, in addition to these two solitary annual grants, they actually mulctured suppliant liberality to give 700*l.* to the Central National School in Kingston, and 200*l.* towards the Union School in Kingston; making in all the sum of 900*l.* granted by the Legislature towards supplying the educational wants of a population of about 350,000 souls. Two thousand pounds, indeed! that is just the sum contributed for the same objects through the agency of a single private individual—the benevolent Joseph Sturge.—Jfm. Colonial Reformer.

CAPS OR GOOD HOPE.—Accounts from the Cape of Good Hope received yesterday morning to the 13th June, which furnish the state of the revenue of the Colony in the year ending the 31st of January last. It appears by the official returns that the value of the exports from the colony was 310,862*l.*, showing a decrease on the previous year of 37,813*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.* The principal falling off had been in the exportation of skins to Great Britain, which was 15,000*l.* less than in the year ending the 31st January, 1838. The quantity of wool shipped to England was valued at 26,638*l.*, showing an increase over the produce of the former year of 4,456*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.* Of imports, the value in the year ending January last, was 1,038,960*l.* In the previous year the imports were 1,090,450*l.*, but which was greatly swelled by the arrivals of specie (287,437*l.*), forming part of the compensation claims due to the colonists on the abolition of slavery. In the last year only 20,142*l.* in specie was received. The accounts from the frontier were more favourable.—Pat.

The following General Orders issued by the Right Honourable the Governor General in the Secret Department, under date the 18th instant, are published for general information to the Army.

Intelligence was this day received, of the arrival, within the Peshawar Territory, of His Excellency Lieutenant-General Sir John Keane, K. C. B. and G. C. H., Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Indus, with a portion of that force on its return to the British Possessions.—The Military operations under the direction of His Excellency having now been brought to a close, the Right Honourable the Governor General has, on the part of the Government of India, in acquittal himself of the obligation of offering publicly his warmest thanks to His Excellency, and to the officers and men who have served under his Command, for the solicitude, spirit and conduct of all ranks, throughout the late campaign, and the again cordially commended them on the attainment of the great object of national security and honour, for which the expedition was undertaken.

The plans of aggression, by which the British Empire in India was dangerously threatened, have, under Providence, been averted. The Chiefs of Cabul and Candahar, who had joined in hostile designs against us, have been deprived of power, and the territories which they ruled have been restored to the Government of a friendly monarch. The Amiers of Sind have acknowledged the supremacy of the British Government, and arranged themselves under its protection.—Their Country will now be an outwork of defence, and the navigation of the Indus within their dominions, exempt from all duties, has been opened to commerce with the British Government. The British Alliance has been confirmed, and a good understanding, with a view to common safety, has been established with that power.

For these important results, the Governor General is proud to express the acknowledgments of the Government to the Army of the Indus, which alike by its valour, its discipline and cheerfulness under hardships and privations, and its conciliatory conduct to the inhabitants of the Countries through which it passed, has earned respect for the British name, and has confirmed, in Central Asia, a just impression of British energy and resources.

The Native and European Soldiers have lived with each other in effect and endurance. A march of extraordinary length, through difficult and untried countries, has been within a few months successfully accomplished, and the capture of the one stronghold where resistance was expected, a trophy of victory has been won, which will add a fresh laurel to the reputation of the Armies of India.

To Lieutenant General Sir John Keane, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, the Governor General would particularly declare his thanks for his direction of those honourable achievements.—He would especially acknowledge the marked forwardness, and just appreciation of the views of the Government, which guided His Excellency in his intercourse with the Amiers of Sind.

He feels the Government to be under the deepest obligations to His Excellency for the unshaken firmness of purpose with which, throughout the whole course of the operations, obstacles and discouragements were disregarded, and the prescribed objects of policy were pursued, and above all, he would warmly applaud the decisive judgment with which the attack upon the fortress of Ghaznee was planned, and its capture effected.—nor would he omit to remark upon that spirit of perfect co-operation with which His Excellency gave all support to the Political authorities with whom he was associated. Mr. Macpherson, the Envoy and Minister at the Court of Shah Shooja (of Moolt), and Colonel Pottinger, the Resident in Sind, have been chiefly enabled by the cordial good understanding which he throughout maintained between His Excellency, to render the important services by which they have entitled themselves to the high approbation of the Government, and His Lordship has much pleasure in the feeling of satisfaction with which His Excellency regarded the valuable services of Lieutenant Colonel Sir Alexander Burnes, who was politically attached to him in the advance upon Ghaznee.

The Governor General would also felicitate the Commander-in-Chief in acknowledging the manner in which Major General Sir William Colburn, K. C. B. and G. C. H., exercised his command of the British Division throughout the Campaign, and in which he showed his Country on the 23d July, and His Lordship would also offer the thanks of the Government to Major General Whitaker, C. B., Commanding the 3d Infantry Division, to Major General Thackwell, C. B. and G. C. H., Commanding the Cavalry Division, to Major General Duff, Commanding the 4th Infantry Brigade, to Brigadier Stevenson, Commanding the Artillery of the Army, to Brigadier Scott, Commanding the Bombay Cavalry Brigade, and to Brigadier Parnell, Commanding the 2d Cavalry Brigade, and to the Commandants of Camps and Detachments, with the officers and men under their respective Commands, and to the several departments of the Secretariat, for the efficient manner in which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has expressed his high satisfaction.

To Brigadier Sir, C. B. already honourably distinguished in the Afghan and Indian Warfare, who Commanded the Storming party at Candahar, to Lieutenant Colonel Denham, C. B., who led the advance on the same occasion, and to Captain George Thomson, of the Bengal Engineers, whose services in the Capture of that fortress have been noticed by the Government, and by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, and to the several departments of the Secretariat, for the efficient manner in which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has expressed his high satisfaction.

In testimony of the services of the Army of the Indus, the Governor General is pleased to resolve, that all the Corps, European and Native, in the Service of the Queen's Regiment, which performed beyond the Indus Pass, shall have on their Regimental Colours the word "Afghanistan," and such of them, as were employed in the reduction of the fortress of that name, the word "Guzerat" in addition.

In behalf of the Queen's Regiment, the Governor General will recommend to Her Majesty, through the proper channel, that the same distinction may be granted to them.

The Governor General would here notice with appreciation the praiseworthy conduct, during this expedition, of the officers and Men attached to the disciplined force of His Majesty Shah Shuja Shah Durrani. These were newly raised, and opportunities had not been afforded for its perfect organization and instruction. But it shared honourably in the labours and difficulties of the Campaign and it had the good fortune, in repelling an attack made by the Enemy in force on the day prior to the storming of Guzman, to be enabled to give promise of the excellent service which may hereafter be expected from it.

His Lordship has also much satisfaction in adding that the best acknowledgments of the Government are due to Lieutenant Colonel Wade, who was employed upon the Peshawar frontier, and who, gallantly supported by the officers and Men of all ranks under him, and seconded by the cordial aid of the Sikh Government—an aid the more honourable because rendered at a painful crisis of its affairs—opened the Khyber Pass and overthrew the power of the Enemy in that quarter at the moment when the advance of the Forces of the Shahshah Taimoor could most conduce to the success of the general operation.

GENERAL ORDER BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Camp Poonah, 18th November, 1898.

The Right Honourable the Governor General, having taken into consideration the heavy losses and expenses incurred by the Commissioned officers and European Troops serving with the Army of the Indus, and being desirous also to mark his admiration of the integrity and soldier-like bearing evinced by all portions of the Army, European and Native, during the recent Campaign in Afghanistan, has been pleased to resolve that a donation of five months full or field Batta shall be granted to the officers and fighting Men of every rank attached to the Army, who advanced beyond the Bolan Pass.

The Honourable the President in Council is requested to issue such subsidiary orders as may be necessary for giving effect to His Lordship's resolution.

J. STUART, Lt. Col. Secy. to Govt. of India, Milg. Dept. with the Right Hon. the Govr. Genl.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CHEAP, COMPLETE AND BEAUTIFUL REPRINT OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S INDIAN DESPATCHES, in 3 vols. 8vo.

Price only Twenty Rupees.

On the 10th of January will be published the Indian Despatches of His Grace the Duke of Wellington, beautifully printed at Bishop's College Press, in 3 volumes, 8vo. neatly bound in cloth and gilt lettered. Price only Twenty Rupees.

"Looking to these Despatches, a collection worth all the classics, and which ought to become a book of study in all places of Education,—a collection, exhibiting as it does in so remarkable a manner, such singleness of purpose, and aim and devotion to his country, such energy of character, such transcendent ability, such unerring judgment, and perseverance surmounting every obstacle, such loftiness combined with such simplicity of character, incapable of any mean or sordid motive,—for all such qualities which were thought to be carried to such a pitch of perfection among the ancients, and looking to the whole connected career of the DUKE OF WELLINGTON, we defy all Greek or Roman History to produce his equal."—Naval and Military Gazette, Feb. 2nd, 1850.

"We have been favoured with a sight of the first portion of the 'Duke of Wellington's Indian Despatches' now printed at Bishop's College Press, and we must pronounce it to be as beautiful a specimen of Indian typography as we have seen in the country."

"A work of such Military celebrity, issuing from the Press in such a cheap form, and at a time when its utility cannot but be appreciated, will, we should imagine, be eagerly purchased, and, we trust, reward the spirited Publisher."

As a limited number of Copies only will be published, the Proprietor respectfully requests intending purchasers will intimate their wishes at an early period.

Printing at Bishop's College Press for ADAM DOUGLAS, and sold by T. OSTELL and Co., British Library, Calcutta.

GREAT MEETING OF THE LANDHOLDERS' ASSOCIATION.

—The Englishman redeemed his promise on Saturday last, by the publication of a full report of the speeches delivered at the meeting of the Landholders' Association, held on Saturday, the 7th instant.

The business of the day was opened by the perusal of a Report of the Transactions of the Society during the last twelve months. Its efforts have been directed primarily to the question of Resumptions, which, at the formation of the Society, was declared by the Chairman, Rajah Radha Kantu Deb, to be the paramount object of the Association. A memorial was sent to the Local Government at the beginning of the year, to request that all enquiry into the invalidity of rent-free tenures, should cease. Government, in its reply, went over the whole field of argument, and gave its reasons, for considering the enquiry into these tenures, and the resumption of such as might be found fictitious to be just, and in accordance with the public declarations which had been put forth from time to time by successive administrations. The Society, on the receipt of this unfavourable reply from the Local Authorities of the Presidency, appealed to the Supreme Government. It was informed that there appeared no ground for reversing the judgement of the Local Administration; but that to remove every ground of complaint, the Executive Government had, after the most careful examination, authorized an extensive relaxation of the law, both as it regarded the resumption and assessment of invalid tenures, as appeared practicable; and that the Landholders under this Presidency would find abundant reason to be satisfied with the indulgence which had been extended to them. And such, we are informed, has been the case, as far as the indulgence has yet been known. One general feeling of satisfaction pervades the Native community. They know full well, that nine-tenths of these tenures were obtained by fraud and collusion, and will not stand the ordeal of a legal scrutiny; and they feel that in leaving these lands in possession of those who have no lawful claim to them, at a perpetual assessment of half the gross rental, the consideration of Government has been eminently manifested.

The Society has also directed its attention to several anomalies in the public administration, and to some grievances, the removal of which, would tend to promote the comfort of the people. In every instance its representations have been received with attention; in some cases the grievance has been removed, and others are now under consideration.

The Report is drawn up in a spirit of equity and moderation. Our only objection to it, refers to the resumptions; which, however, the Landholders are fully justified in seeking to extinguish, by all just and constitutional means. We are happy to perceive that even on this subject, which is naturally a sore one, the Report adopts calm and unexceptionable language, and steers clear of those charges of injustice and bad faith, which are so liberally bestowed on Government, in the speeches and correspondence of its partisans. Holding, as we do, that the demand of rent from lands which have been nefariously abstracted from the State is both just in principle, and necessary to the integrity of the public resources, we shall, of course, continue to maintain our views. On the minor objects of pursuit, the Society appears to have exerted itself with a laudable view to general interests; and if its exertions should be continued in the same spirit, and directed to kindred objects, it will realize the hopes we formed of its utility, when it was organized. The caution which we ventured to offer to the Society, regarding the danger to which it was exposed of being led into unsafe paths, and which has been erroneously attributed to a spirit of hostility, was, we feel, fully justified by some of the sentiments which were delivered at the meeting. If, for example, the Society were to act under the influence of Mr. Hume's speech, and to adopt those extreme views of Indian policy, which he embodied in it; if it was supposed to believe, that the only unfounded assertion in Lord Brougham's address was, that which gave the Government of this country credit for some benevolence of intention, if not of deed, the prospect of its utility to the country would be reduced within a very narrow compass.

A large field of exertion, in which the Society may co-operate with the public authorities, to promote the reciprocal benefit of rulers and ruled, is open to its view. But the good which it is able to accomplish in its associated capacity, is little, compared with that which its members have the means of doing in their individual characters. Standing in a position between the Government and the peasantry, with the former above them, and the latter beneath them, the Landholders must be fully aware that the Ryots, from their numbers, if from no other cause, have larger claims on their consideration and compassion, than they can draw on that of Government. Their situation is one of large responsibility. The happiness of the agricultural class depends far more on the conduct they may pursue, than upon the measures of Government. For one grievance which Government can remove by law, there are ten which they, and they alone, can heal in practice. There are a thousand cases of oppression, under which this land now groans, arising out of the connection between tenant and landlord, which cannot be reached by any ingenuity of legislation, but which may be at once redressed by their efforts. If all that the Landholders have asked of Government, even to the concession of the resumptions, were granted to-morrow, we question whether it would add a cowree to the daily pittance of the poor labourer, who must pay equally for his plot of ground, whether the Government obtains its share of the rent or not. We hope that the union which has been formed with the British India Society at home, combined with that European intercourse into which so many Landholders are now introduced by the Association, will tend, at no distant period, to raise the condition of the peasantry, as well as of their landlords.

Mr. Dickens entered very largely into the question of Resumptions, and endeavoured to prove that the act of resuming the invalid tenures, which had been created by hundreds and thousands during the minority, so to speak, of our administration, was a violation of the public faith. We cannot follow his train of reasoning, without extending this article to a very inconvenient length. At some future peried we hope to find leisure for the discussion of this subject upon the ground he has taken up, as well as of Mr. Leitch's analysis of the Revenue system. At present we would simply remark, that we are unable to see the ground on which he asserts, that the recent reduction of the assessment of certain lands to one-half the gross rental, gives the inference "that Government prefers to keep one-half the profits of the measure, which it virtually condemns" that "half is given to the Landholders for justice, and half retained by the Local Government, as the profits of injustice;" and, generally, that the Landholders having now obtained half their demand, must appeal to England for the other half. We pass over the ungenerous assumption, that Government, in its leniency towards those who are judicially proved to have no title to exemption from being taxed, has been actuated by exceptional motives. There may be such a thing as justice to the motives of public men, as well as justice to the people; and those who advocate the latter, should not be forgetful of the former. But let us examine this assertion, the object of which is to give the credit of the recent relaxation to the Society, by an appeal to facts. Government declared, many years ago, that all tenures, which were held before the Bungalow year 1179, and which were proved to be unusual, should be assessed at half the gross rental; that subsequent tenures which might be resumed, should be so assessed, as to leave the holder about one-fourth the rent. By the recent offer, the larger indulgence of half the rent is extended to all tenures. We might here observe by the way, that if Mr. Leitch's doctrine be correct, that for all lands in the permanently assessed provinces, the landlord receives a rent of only ten per cent. Government, in conceding fifty per cent., besides the mesne profits, to those who hold lands surreptitiously obtained, and in thus rendering their condition better five-fold than that of the ordinary Zemindar, cannot be said to act with any very great injustice. But to the point. If a grant of one-half the rent of these invalid tenures is to be considered as a concession of one-half the Landholders' demands, then the previous grant of one-fourth the rent, in reference to a large portion of the lands, should be considered as a concession of one-fourth of the claims of this Society; to assert which, would be an absurdity. Again; as to the tenures, dated before 1179, which have been assessed for more than half a century on their resumption at one-half the rent, how can it be said that Government has given "you," meaning always the Landholders' Society, which is but of yesterday, one-half for justice? Lastly; if the recent concession of half the rent is to be viewed as a virtual condemnation of all re-summptions; is not the leaving a fourth of the rent with the landlords equally a condemnation of it; and in this case will it not appear that Government, by leaving any rent whatever with them, condemned the whole measure? When Mr. Dickens enumerated the obstacles which the appeal to England was likely to encounter, he forgot to mention that the strongest of all obstacles was this, which arose from the very arguments which were brought forward, to maintain this demand for a release from all taxation in all time to come, which demand had no other foundation than the most notorious frauds on the revenue.

We would not willingly forfeit the good opinion, of Dwarkanath Tagore, and least of all, by any application of the word selfish to exertions in which he takes an interest. We have not forgotten the high occasion on which his name was associated with one of the most glorious deeds of mercy, by which the British Administration has been rendered illustrious; nor will we forget that when the orthodox party raised so loud an outcry against him for his support of the abolition of Sattavee, we stood forward boldly in his vindication. Neither has the public forgotten his princely liberality to the poor of Calcutta. We object to our having applied the word selfish to the objects of the Landholders' Association, and to our having stated that they had conspired against Government. The word conspiring is not, however, to be found in our article. As to selfishness, we fear we cannot acquit the Society of the charge. It is, doubtless, true, that Mr. Dickens holds no rent-free tenures, and we have heard that Dwarkanath Tagore has none on the rent-roll. Yet this does not prove that the demand of exemption from taxation, is not as selfish in India as it is in England. When the soap-boilers send a deputation to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to request a repeal of the soap duties, the Chancellor considers their demand selfish. They may be, therefore, selfishness, without baseness. In fact, every demand for a peculiar advantage, in which others do not participate, is, in a moral, if not in a financial sense, selfish. But we did not mean to insinuate that there is anything more extraordinary in the conduct of the rent-free holders, when they demand to be exonerated from all contribution to the State, than there is in a similar demand by any class in England.

Our remarks on the course pursued by the British India Society, were aimed at on the meeting, in language which it would be imprudent to imitate. We have acknowledged the high claims of some of the most distinguished members of the Society to public confidence and esteem. We have not read unmoved, the glowing picture drawn by George Thompson, of what India would be, if its own ardent aspirations for its welfare were realized. We rejoice to find eloquence the most sublime, and philanthropy the most pure, enlisted in the cause of this country. We acknowledge with pleasure, that the exordium of Lord Brougham's address, which Mr. Turtton quoted in his speech, was no less remarkable for its truth, than its eloquence. And we feel a corresponding degree of regret, that the subsequent remarks of the noble Lord should have breathed a different spirit; and that the efforts of the succeeding speakers should have been mainly directed to destroy its effect, by counter statements.

We appeal, with perfect confidence, to every man who has any acquaintance with the history, the government, or the people of India, whether the description given of our administration at the London meeting, bore the faintest resemblance to the reality. We pass over the Chairman's assertion, that in the permanently assessed provinces, there was but to the cultivator and the landlord just one-tenth of the produce of the soil. If this was any thing but a figure of rhetoric, if it had any foundation in truth, most assuredly the Natives would not cling to that settlement, made by Lord Cornwallis as to the great charter of their privileges, which it would be perfidious to touch. Instead of deprecating any revision of the permanent settlement, as the last of calamities, they would surely be anxious that it should be broken up, and that their rents should be re-adjusted on the more lenient terms which have been given to all other Zemindars at this Presidency. It was stated at the meeting, "that our territories in India had been acquired by a series of unmixed cruelty and perpetual deceit;—that our possessions had been acquired in a manner too atrocious to be described." Is this the language of truth? "The Gentoo tax," it is said, "amounted to one-sixth,"—of this there is no historical proof,—the Mahomedan conquerors augmented this to one-fourth. "Then come England. All is little enough for England, which leaves nothing but a bare subsistence to the unhappy proprietors." Is this the language of truth? Is it not a fact, that the assessments of the Lower Provinces,—of the Western we have not the same correct data,—is rather less, than more, under our administration, than it was under that of the Mahomedans, though the tax-payers have increased fifty per cent? Is it true that "in all parts of India, except Bengal, Bihar and Orissa, Government takes the whole gross produce, leaving in the country nothing but a bare subsistence?" We do not ask for an explanation of that figure of speech, which represents the people as living upon the remainder, after Government has taken the whole; but we ask the most violent opponent of our administration to point out a single district in which the State takes the whole of the gross produce. It was affirmed, moreover, at that meeting, respecting India, that "her Princes were ground down to the earth; her nobles starving, or in exile; her gentry peasants; and her peasants, a wild, roving, vagrant race, without even the wretched comfort of a poor-house." Again we ask is this picture correct? As to one hundred millions of vagrants roving about from the Himalaya to Cape Comorin, the unhappy victims of British tyranny and oppression, the thing is impossible; it is a fiction of the imagination. But her gentry have been reduced to the condition of peasants! Let us appeal to facts. We turn to the list of Proprietors of the new Bombay Bank, to whom a Charter is about to be given, which was published in the last Official Gazette, and we find that one hundred and forty of these peasants have subscribed for one thousand, five hundred and forty-two of these shares, a sum of one hundred and fifty-four thousand Pounds Sterling! We find, moreover, that at the great meeting of the Landholders' Society, on the 7th of December, at which one thousand of the gentry, whom British oppression had reduced to the condition of peasants, were present, Mr. Dickens, in allusion to this peasantry, said, "the amount of property possessed by the supporters of this Association in the country, is enormous. I point to many of the Native gentlemen, and others, around this table, and I see at one glance, men possessed of landed estates in the country, which millions could not purchase." It appears, then, that although Government has reduced the gentry to the condition of peasants, it has still left them the fortune of princes. "I point," said Mr. Dickens, "to my young friend, Kishore Kistoonath Roy, the mover of this resolution, the second largest landholder in Bengal." Is he an instance of the gentry reduced to peasants; or is he not an example of peasants raised to gentry? His great grandfather was Kanto Baboo, Mr. Hastings's Dewan, immortalized in the speeches of Burke, who entered the service of his master without one ancestral cowrie to bless himself with. He bequeathed a fortune of more than a million sterling to his posterity, all acquired in the service of those who have reduced the gentry to peasants. And, strange to say, young Kistoonath Roy will attain his majority in a few months, and succeed to this unimpaired princely fortune. If the family flourished under the Mahomedan Government, the youth's grandfather would have been obliged to refund to the public exchequer all that portion of the fortune made in the public service, which he could not secrete; and the Nabob of Moorsabad would have squeezed the sponge dry.

Is it true of India, as stated in one of the speeches of the British India Society, "that its capital is wasted—its property—its prosperity—its happiness; all, all, extinct; all at an end?" Then as to the famine, was it not stated at the London meeting, that our Government was established in 1760; "that the first famine soon followed, viz. in 1766;" that it was succeeded by no fewer than sixteen famines; and was it not distinctly, unequivocally affirmed, that "this was the result of our Government?" Is not this tantamount to saying, that the British Government was the cause of the famine; and we, again, ask, is this the language of truth? Is it fair to swell the catalogue of British crimes, by making us answerable for the famine which, in 1834, desolated the independent state of Gwalior? Is it a fact, or a fiction, that "the poor and half-starving people of India are now screaming out to the people of England, if not for vengeance on those who fostered them,"—meaning the families, not the people,—"at least that an end might be put to a system which turned fields of abundance, into fields of pestilence and desolation?" Is it not, on the contrary, true, that the people are calling down blessings on that benevolent Government which stepped forward to sustain their existence, and which contributed in donations of money, and remissions of revenue, a sum of not less than four hundred and thirty-five thousand pounds, to mitigate this calamity? If the object of the speaker had been the dissemination of truth, rather than the creation of a prejudice against the administration of this country, would he, after having searched the records of history, and numbered up the years of scarcity, have overlooked this bright fact? Is it true that the British Government is "poisoning the inhabitants, by denying them that necessary article with which God had blessed them, salt?" Is it consistent with truth to describe this Government as "murderers by starvation?"

It is impossible to hear charges so utterly unfounded, we do not say without indignation, but without despair of the cause they pretended to sustain; that cause being the slave of India. The Court of Directors have nothing to fear, and India nothing to hope, from such misrepresentations. Why, if half that was said at that meeting was true, the British Government in the East is the greatest incarnation of vice and injustice, which the world has ever seen. But it is not that cruel, savage, famine-fostering monster. True, it is as despotic as a Government, unchecked by a representative body is usually found to be, but it is not a blood-thirsty tyrant. The British Government has conferred incalculable blessings on India; yet the good which it has done, is nothing to the good which yet remains to be done. Like all other large and powerful bodies, it requires the stimulus of the public voice, and the control of public opinion. That this stimulus might be applied in the most effectual manner, and as rapidly as the occasion should arise, it has made the Press of India free, and the Press has repaid Government for its liberality, by hunting out cases of oppression; by standing ready to represent grievances which might otherwise have never caught the eye of authority; and by assisting the rulers of the land with its vigilance and its ability to govern the country aright. We are aware that this liberty of the Press was censured at home; and we must, therefore, be considered throughout, as limiting our remarks, in a great measure, to the Local Government, whose acts and motives are open to view. We know that it was considered a problem so far back as in the reign of Lord Wellesley, whether the blessings which our Government had conferred on India, were offset granted with the concurrence, or in spite of the Cabinet in London, Pall Mall Street; and we fear the problem is not yet solved. A Government, such as the speakers of the London Society described this Government to be, would never have allowed such a monitor to the Press so near the throne. The freedom of the Press is the best and the most unequivocal pledge of honest intentions which any Government can give; and that pledge has been given us. The concessions which the British India Society can give to the greatest foe of Indian regeneration, by informing the public mind at home, and by creating an interest in the community, sufficiently strong to break the Indian Chamber of Parliament, is great, and cannot be too highly prized, but it must strictly adhere to the truth; it must give its opponents no opportunity of neutralizing his statements, by charging them with exaggeration or bias, or with falsehood. It must draw public attention to each, practical, substantial, non-viable evil. Leaving the terms of fallen Princes to the tragic muse, it must endeavor to discover what is the actual condition of the labouring classes; what proportion of the produce the labourer is called to pay for his land; how much of this goes to the State; how much to the Zemindars and their underlings. It must strive to ascertain in how many provinces the peasant is obliged to content himself with a meal a day, and trace this calamity to its source. There is a boundless field for the benevolent operation of this Society, in the improvement of India, even though the Government should be exactly the reverse of the descriptions given of it.

We cannot close without apologizing for the unusual length of this article. But it was unavoidable. We considered the extended notice taken of this journal, by the various speakers at the Town Hall, as the greatest distinction we have ever enjoyed, and we were anxious to manifest our gratitude, by repaying the compliment.

STATE OF AFFAIRS IN CHINA.—Intelligence has been received from China to the 20th of October; but the prospect of a rectification of truth, before the arrival of definitive instructions from England appears just as remote as ever. It appears that some time in September, the Imperial Commissioner Joo-tai orders to the inhabitants of the Coast, to refuse all provisions to the English, under any circumstances; to cut off the supplies of water to the fleet; and to put to death any Englishman who might land. Several of our countrymen, who had left their ships, not having been heard of for some days, Capt. Elliot, supposing that they had been put to death by the Chinese, issued a proclamation, declaring the Port of Canton in a state of blockade. This roused the indignation of Lin, the Commissioner, who issued a counter-proclamation, in which he asks: "Now, who is this Elliot that so presumptuously dares to prohibit the vessels of other countries from entering the port? Such conduct as this is outrageously obstinate, and it will be impossible for me again to excuse his offences." He then proceeds to order that all foreign ships shall freely enter the Port. Meanwhile the safety of the missing men having been ascertained, the blockade was removed.

It appears, moreover, that the Chinese, rising in fear demands in proportion to our quiescence, proceeded to demand that every Captain entering the Port should sign a bond, making himself to be amenable, in all cases, exclusively to the Chinese tribunals. This demand was, of course, refused. The Officers might as well have been called to bind themselves to be amenable to a New Zealand tribunal, which would have condemned its victim to be eaten up, with more regard to its own cannibal appetite, than to the principles of justice.

The suspension of the trade having been found equally as inconvenient to the Chinese, as it was to the English, Captain Elliot and the Commissioner came to a mutual understanding, that till instructions should arrive from England, the trade should be revived outside the Bogue, on these conditions; that all Opium transactions should cease; that the British Superintendent should prevent the importation of the drug; and that if, after a strict investigation, any Opium was found, he should make up objection to the confiscation of the cargo; that the demand for signing the bond of submission to the Chinese tribunals should be waived, upon the condition that the ships should be subject to examination; and that vessels while discharging their cargoes outside the Bogue, should pay the measurement charges, the pilot's dues, and the linguist's fees, as if they went up to Whampoa. As soon as the negotiation was completed, the Superintendent earnestly advised the Captains of vessels not to enter within the Bogue. But Capt. Werner, of the Thomas Coates, declining all caution, at once entered the Bogue; and it appears that he, his officers and crew, were immediately seized; and Lin, in violation of his engagement, peremptorily demanded the delivery of the murderer of Lin Wee-hoo, and the entrance of the ships into Whampoa, with the signature of the legislation bond; and if these conditions were not complied with, he ordered all vessels to depart under menace of destruction. Capt. Elliot, therefore, requested Capt. Smith, of H. M. S. Vulgar, to take whatever steps might seem best calculated to prevent the further entrance of all British vessels within the grasp of the Chinese Government. Such was the state of affairs when the last vessel came away. There does not seem any chance of an amicable arrangement of affairs, and there is every probability that the season will wear away without the shipment of any tea to England, and that the dangers in high life will be driven to coffee and cocoa; and the dangers in low life, to the gin palace; that our beloved native land, deprived of its accustomed beverage, will be driven into actual rebellion against the present Ministry, and that the Royal Exchequer will be kept empty to the extent of four million sterling.

We had almost forgotten to mention a singular proclamation of the Lord High Admiral Kwan. As we may possibly be brought into hostile collision with the Chinese, and our Naval Officers may soon be called to meet them in action, it is well they should know whom they will have to encounter. No less a person than Admiral Kwan, who will put our ships, as he has already put our heralds, to the blush.

"I, the Admiral," says he, "am descended from a family that dates as far back as the Han dynasty, (2,000 years ago) the line of my forefathers spring from Hotung. My ancestor was the deified Emperor Kwan-koo-tze (commonly called the Mars of China) splendid as luminous was his fame! bright and dazzling the place of his Imperial abode! That gallant warrior's ardent wish was to practise benevolence and virtue! his mind was grand and powerful as the winds and clouds; his heart genial and refulgent as the sun day or the moon by night! Now, I, the said Admiral, fly like an arrow to recompense the goodness of my country, and tremblingly receive the admonitions of my Great Ancestor: I deal not in deceptions and frauds, nor do I covet the bloody laurels of the butcher!" And these words are "true as if spoken by Buddha himself." He concludes his proclamation by assuring the English, that the Chinese have often enjoyed the divine patronage! and that the very gods and spirits cannot interfere for us.

Our quotation more. It is well known that the Company's Government has advetized the sale of some 18,000 or 19,000 chests of Opium this season. Now let us see how these chests will be treated by Her Majesty's Government, when they arrive in China. Capt. Elliot, in the course of his negotiation with Lin, thus lays down his own course of procedure:

"Having already taken severe measures, there ought not to be one catty of Opium in the fleet, nor does H. M. S. the Fly in the protection of a traffic declared illegal by the Emperor, and, therefore, whenever a vessel is suspected of having Opium on board, Captain Elliot will take care that the officers of his establishment shall accompany the Chinese officers in their search, and that, if, after strict investigation, Opium shall be found; he will offer no objection to the seizure and confiscation of the cargo. Again, if the consiness of a vessel profit by Opium on board of her, and does not declare the same to him, that it may be reported, he will offer no appeal if the firm be expelled from the empire. He proposes that to separate the lawful from the unlawful trade, no firm shall be allowed to reside or trade in China, until he, Capt. Elliot, shall have forwarded to the high officers a declaration signed by each member of it, solemnly declaring they have no concern, direct or indirect, with Opium: neither will they permit any one under their controul to have anything to do with the drug, and that they be made aware that detection will cause their immediate expulsion; and he further proposes that unless the commander and consignee of every vessel, on the day of arrival, hand in to him a solemn declaration, in Chinese and English, that she has brought no Opium to China, no one on board, neither will receive any, she shall not be allowed to trade."

DEATH OF CAPT. TAYLOR.—We record, with deep regret, the death of Capt. T. J. Taylor. Descended from the illustrious house of Pitt, he longed, with ardour, for some opportunity to raise himself to distinction; and while a subaltern in the Madras army, made known his wishes to Lord W. Bentinck. His Lordship immediately appointed him to the important duty of Secretary to the Committee of Post Office Enquiry and Improvement. In this post he laboured with indefatigable industry, in accumulating and digesting information, and in drawing up a plan for consolidating the Post Offices of the different Presidencies, and for the entire reform of the department. His comprehensive views were adopted by Government, and made the basis of those regulations which have diffused universal satisfaction through the country. On the dissolution of the Committee, he was dispatched into the interior of the country, to make enquiries for the further improvement of the Post Office; and he again drew up an able report, which obtained the approbation of the authorities. In the recent additional reforms which have been made in this department, we are enabled to trace, in almost every instance, the recommendations of Captain Taylor. After having rendered the most eminent service to the country, he quitted the army, and entered the house of Carr, Tagore and Co.; but his active mind could not confine itself to the dull details of the desk. He projected a Company for the establishment of a Floating Bridge across the river at Calcutta, and had he lived, would, doubtless, have been instrumental in carrying it into effect. His premature death, at the early age of thirty-five, with the prospect of a long career of public usefulness before him, is a general loss to the interests of society.

THE SCOTTISH MISSION.—We had occasion, a fortnight ago, to remark on the strange assertion of Dr. Bryce, that it was only now, as the mode of instruction, adopted at the Church of Scotland's Institution is coming into operation, that the full value seems about to be appreciated, of research into the philosophy and literature of the Hindoos, and the application of the fruits of such research to the purposes of Native Education. With every one at all acquainted with the case, we thought it absurd that a claim for distinction should be made, on this ground, in behalf of the Assembly's Institution. The Scottish Mission has been the very last in pursuing the course, in which Dr. Bryce represents it to be taking the lead. Accordingly we observed, that in every Mission in India, except that of the Scottish Church, we are familiar with some, at least, of its members, who have been diligent in furnishing themselves for their work, by deep study of Hindoo literature; and the less studious of their Colleagues have profited by their research: but in the Scottish Mission, except at Bombay, no Oriental scholar has yet been found." Now it has been pointed out to us, that, while our observation states what is, indeed, the fact, it does so in a manner injurious to the Missionaries of the Scottish Church, for it seems to imply a contrast between diligence in duty on the part of others, and remissness on their part. We regret exceedingly that language should have fallen from us capable of such a construction: for, most assuredly, there are no Missionaries for whom we have a higher esteem than those of the Assembly's Mission; and there are none more remarkable for diligence and exertion. The numerous and crowded classes of the Seminary, the well-digested information of its pupils, and the constant rise in the character of their studies each successive year, furnish abundant proof of unwearied study and labour on the part of the Teachers. Such results appear at each Annual Examination of the Assembly's Institution could be attained only by uninterrupted assiduity. And at the same time we must remember, that it has been only at intervals that more than one Missionary has been capable of giving his strength to the work. The necessary absence of Dr. Duff, and that of Mr. Mackay, and the frequent illness of Mr. Macdonald, have thrown the chief burden lately upon Mr. Ewart; and the ordinary, unavoidable school duties of these gentlemen, in successive years, can quite suffice to justify their want of eminence in Oriental scholarship. It cannot, therefore, be brought against them as a reproach. But then it makes Mr. Bryce's picture of the Assembly's Institution absurd. We say absurd, that his description of a Missionary of the High Church, and his description of the Seminary. Nevertheless, neither the Missionaries nor the Seminary are less worthy of admiration on that account.

THE INDIAN DESPATCHES OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—We have carefully gone through the first volume of this publication, which will have been forwarded a few days ago. After the universal applause which has been bestowed on the Despatches of the Duke, by all the influential periodical publications in England, of every shade of political views, without exception, it might seem of affectation were we to add our humble tribute to its merits. But the re-publication in this country of that portion of these invaluable documents, which refer to His Grace's military and political career in India, enables us to offer an opinion, without the appearance of presumption. In issuing this work, we think the publishers have conferred a general benefit on the country, and more especially on the officers of the army. The larger work, which embraced the entire series of Despatches, was necessarily unsuited, by its bulk and price, to the convenience of a large portion of the army; and a selection of those papers confined to the India campaigns was, therefore, necessary, to enable them to turn the military experience of the great Captain of the Age to account. In the present work, the Indian soldier will find a sure and unerring directory for his conduct, in all the circumstances in which he may be called to act in this country. He will be enabled to trace the career which led the Duke up to the most enviable position in society, in the zeal, activity, good sense, foresight, and perseverance, which distinguished his career. It is a work which every officer of this army, who aims at distinction in his profession, ought to make the object of his particular study; and we are happy to find that the publishers have fixed the price at so reasonable an amount, as to bring it within reach of the youngest officer of the army. We hope the spirit they have infused on this occasion, will be rewarded by the disposal of the entire impression, and a call for a second.

GOVERNMENT PATRONAGE OF JUGGUNNATH.—Our readers will remember the disappointment experienced last season, when, after all the orders from home, and the professions of the Government here, it was found that the Pilgrim Tax was levied in Pooree, at the great festivals of Juggunnath, just as of old. We regret to learn, that there is a disposition in the Government Officers in Orissa, to seek permission to play the same game again next season. But we would fain hope that public principle and feeling, and public promises and protestations will not be treated with mockery in this way. Now that the general population have come to understand the measure that has been proposed, it has become an object of eager expectation. They have no thought of slight being intended on their religion; but are loud in commendation of so meritorious a deed, as the abolition of the Pilgrim Tax will be. Many are already bending their steps to Pooree, in the hope of a free entrance being granted them; and if Government do not keep their word, the taunings of the disappointed pilgrims will be added to the remonstrances of the English people, till the opportunity pass away of making the abolition of the tax an act of grace in the eyes either of England or India.

There is a point of some difficulty to be settled in the abolition of the tax. It seems the Khurda Raja and the Priests of Juggunnath were anciently in the habit of collecting, for the service of the temple, some irregular kinds of cess from the inhabitants of the province of Orissa, and, in particular, a sort of poll-tax of one anna a head of males, heads of families, which was levied not regularly, but occasionally. But the Government feeling that collections of this nature ought not to be allowed, stipulated with the parties who made them, and appropriated them to the temple service, that on condition of their being abolished for ever, it would collect a tax and support the establishment of the idols itself, so as to render the levying of the cess unnecessary. This arrangement, we are told, was actually made; and the record of it now stands in the books of the Tax Office at Pooree. Both the Government and the Priests are aware of this compact. The Government, therefore, in giving up the Pilgrim Tax, and withdrawing their support from the temple, feel that they are bound either to allow the irregular collections to be levied again, or to pay annually for the use of the temple an equivalent sum. To do the former is out of the question; and, therefore, they design to contribute 5,000 Rupees annually for the maintenance of the idols.

Thus, then, on one hand there is a distinct pledge on the part of Government, to depart from which would be a breach of public faith; and on the other, there is a perpetuating of idolatry by the resources of the State; and, what is worse, support given to the credit of idolatry, by constant payments from the public treasury for its use. What to recommend in such a case we know not. But we have thought it might be disposed of with the least mischief, by Government receiving the annual contribution, by payment at once of an adequate sum, to be invested or disposed of in what way the parties concerned saw fit; as any bequest might be which was made for the benefit of the temple. Such a payment might, perhaps justly, be considered as a gracious redemption of the people of Orissa from a vexatious impost, rather than a contribution to the support of idolatry; and at any rate it would close all official connection between the establishment of Juggunnath, and the revenues of the State.

DARJELING.—A meeting of the Darjeling Association was held at the Trades Hall, on Saturday last, at which a report of progress of a highly satisfactory nature was read. The public is aware, that the attempt to open the Hotel at the beginning of the last hot season failed, through the obstacles which are inseparable from any inelegant attempt of this nature, in novel and untoward circumstances. But the failure, so far from damping the ardour of those who have projected this spirited attempt, seems to have inspired them with additional zeal. More especially has the indefatigable Secretary of the Association devoted his time, his labour and his purse to this object, and we are happy to learn with every prospect of complete success. The Hotel will be fully completed by the 1st of March next year, and with far superior accommodations than were at first designed. The roof, which was to have been made of clay, will now be tiled; fifty men are engaged in the manufacture of tiles, and they produce a thousand a day. The floors and verandas will be boarded; the bed-rooms properly ventilated, and the building will have doors of communication for the convenience of families. A contract has been made for the erection of a kitchen, large godowns and servants' accommodations, at an expense not far short of 10,000 Rupees. The deficiency of labourers and workmen, which formerly impeded all operations, has now been removed. By the last accounts, no fewer than seven hundred men were engaged in actual labour, and the entire number of men of all description employed under Hepper, Martin and Co., in all phases, did not fall short of eight hundred and fifty. The last season was, it is true, a season of failure, but it was also one of experience, which has been turned to the best account. We ought also to state, that another Hotel is now rising at Kursing, twenty-four miles distant from Darjeling, at an elevation of 4,000 feet. It is built by private subscription, and is intended for those in delicate health, for whom the climate of Darjeling might prove too cold. This Hotel will also be opened on the 1st of March. At Mahuldean, six miles from Kursing, a bungalow is likewise building; and another half way on the new line towards Darjeling will be finished next summer.

All these exertions, however, have not been made without a very heavy outlay; and we are sorry to perceive that the brunt of the expense has fallen on the enterprising Secretary, whose responsibilities are represented in the following statement:

Expended in furniture and buildings,	37,499	3	6

Deficiency, ..... 21,439    6    6

Many of the original shareholders have withdrawn, as successive demands were made upon them for instalments, and the payment of the balance of 50 Rupees a share from those who remain, will not produce 4,000 Rupees. It is, therefore, indisputably necessary, that the public should step forward, without delay, to assist this enterprise. We sincerely trust the call of the Committee will be cheerfully responded to by the community; and that funds will be raised sufficient to clear off all existing incumbrances, and to complete this noble undertaking. However indifferent we may seem to it with our present delightful weather, with the thermometer at 60, no sooner shall our hot days have set in, and the thermometer have risen to 96, than we shall be longing for a residence at the "bright spot," with its low temperature. To prevent disappointments, efforts must be made before the hot weather arrives.

After the great efforts which have been made by public and private enterprise, it is not too much to call on Government to perform its share of duty, in the construction of roads and bridges, and the completion of the line of communication. Even in the execution of this official duty, it has been assisted by a noble female Zemindar at Bangalore, who has devoted 10,000 Rupees to the erection of bridges on this line. Mr. Halket, the enterprising Magistrate of Dinapore, has also constructed a buggy road through his district. The most immediate mode in which the public authorities can aid this undertaking, is to allow that gentleman to employ the convicts in the completion of a road, or rather in the re-opening of a road from the Ganges to Titania, which he engages to do with the 7,000 Rupees which he has, and with the aid of convicts. While Government is hesitating about compliance with this request, invaluable time is passing away, and the hot weather is coming on with a steady pace. Is it too much to hope that this matter may be brought to an early issue? Mr. Prinsep's communication, promising a special reference to Mr. Halket's, is dated forty-three days ago. Oh! for Professor O'Shaughnessy's new telegraph between Mr. Prinsep's and Mr. Halket's Office!

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12.

— Sir Edward Ryan, the Chief Justice's, address to the Grand Jury is given in this morning's Marker. His Lordship clearly explained the operation of the late Magistrate Act, the object of which, he stated, was to dispose of cases of simple larceny, without inflicting undue punishment on the offender. He stated, at the same time, that the Act had not been clearly understood; that the Magistrates had still decided many cases, the jurisdiction of which had been taken away from them, and had sent up to the Supreme Court cases over which they had jurisdiction.

— A large seizure of shawls, of the value of a lakh and seventy-five thousand Rupees, has been made at Banour, near Hansi. The owners were endeavouring to evade the frontier duties.

— The Naval Commander-in-Chief at Bombay, has just gone on a cruise in H. M. S. Wellington, for the benefit of his health, and intends to return before the arrival of the next Mail; which shows that no definitive orders have been received by the last Mail.

— H. M. S. Conroy, is under orders for Madras, on Saturday next, there to await the arrival of orders from the Admiral. H. M. S. Chilfers may be duly expected; and the Pharos in the course of a month or six weeks. The Dread, Lord John Churchill, will, after quitting New Zealand, be attached to the East India Station. We shall be able, therefore, to show the Chinese a strong number of vessels of war, if they should drive us to extremities.

— The annual dinner and show of Vegetables is fixed for Thursday, the 9th of January. At the last meeting of the Agri-Horticultural Society, a remarkably fine specimen of Upland Georgia Cotton, in pod, from Col. Skinner, at Hansi, is said to have looked more like an acclimatized article, than any thing which has been yet seen.

— Both the Baptist and the Roman Catholic Chapels, at Nowrah, have just been entered by robbers, and plundered. — The Bombay papers state, that the H. C. Sloop of War, Elphinstone, has sailed for Aden, with a reinforcement of troops.

— A Thug has just been arrested by Mr. H. C. Metcalfe, the Magistrate at Bardwan, who confesses to having been concerned in thirty-five or thirty-six robberies. He was engaged as a labourer, at an Indigo Factory, when apprehended.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 13.

— Intelligence has been received of the decease of Admiral Sir Frederick Maitland, on board H. M. S. the Hilary, at Bombay. Minute guns, corresponding with the age of the deceased, were fired from the ramparts of Fort William.

— The Englishman, in answer to several enquiries, states that the Windsor put into Foulad Harbour, for repairs, in consequence of damages sustained in a gale of wind, in the Bay of Bascy.

— Mr. Lackersteen, a Catholic citizen of Calcutta, who succeeded to Rome last year, has, we are told, been present to His Holiness, by Dr. St. Leger. Pope Gregory the XVI. received him graciously, and condescended to transmit his blessing through him to his family.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14.

— A very extensive sale of fancy articles was held at the Town Hall, on Thursday and Friday last, in aid of the Schools of the Baptist Missionary Society. We are happy to find that the sum realized did not fall far short of 4,500 Rupees.

— Intelligence of a very important character was yesterday received from China, extending to the 30th of October. For particulars we must refer to our editorial notice.

— The members of the Regatta Club, held a meeting yesterday, at which it was determined to get up a boat race.

— The Hutchinson Cherokee, which was launched at Kidderpore, in July last, has established a character for sailing, which few, even of the clippers, have attained. She arrived at Macao on the 5th of October, after a passage of only eleven days from Singapore. She has beaten the St. Edward, Ryan, the best of the clippers, six days in the passage from Singapore.

— The Englishman has circulated, with this day's paper, a full report of the speeches delivered at the meeting of the Landholders' Society, on Saturday last.

— The Rajah of Kishengaur having determined to proceed on pilgrimage to Allahabad, Gya and Saggaunah, Capt. Payne, of the 30th N. I. has been deputed to accompany him, and it is ordered that his arrival and departure from any cantonment shall be announced by a salute of guns.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15.

— Information was received, on Saturday of the fall of Khelat. The Sikhs had forced with the utmost treachery towards the English troops, on their way to Kandahar, and captured a battery entirely by surprise. It was determined to re-quit him. General W. G. M. marching back with the Bombay troops, was ordered to bring him to account. With only a thousand men, the majority Europeans, he appeared before the place on the 12th, and the next day stormed the heights which commanded the town, burst open the gate of the citadel with his cannon, and the troops rushed in gallantly, and in one hour possessed themselves of the place. It was most bravely defended. Mohab Khan, the Chief, fell sword in hand, with eight of his principal officers, among whom were some of his nearest relatives. He died covered with wounds and glory. On our side, the loss was not inconsiderable. One officer killed; eight wounded; some severely; and one hundred and thirty of the men either killed or wounded. Capt. Outram, an enterprising officer of the Bombay establishment, made his way through Belochistan in disguise, travelling 350 miles in seven days and a half, that he might bring early intelligence of the event to Bombay.

— A Coroner's Inquest was held on Saturday last, on the body of a Native, who came by his death foully in the house of Rajah Baidenath Roy. His two sons are said to be implicated in the affair. Mr. Clarke attended on their behalf. The Jury brought in a verdict of wilful murder against some person or persons unknown.

— The British troops have had some severe skirmishing with the wild and barbarous inhabitants of the Khyber mountains. They have been successfully routed; but two of our officers have been wounded. From time immemorial have they been accustomed to levy black mail on all passengers, and it is said that Col. Wade's neglecting to pay them a stipulated sum has led to the present outrages.

— Letters have been received from Rangoon to the 1st of December. All tranquil and quiet.

— The experiment of blowing up the wreck of the Esperanza, in Futala Reach, on Saturday last, was completely successful. The quantity of powder exploded, was 2,600 lbs. The mine was sprung by the voltaic battery, under the direction of Dr. O'Shaughnessy. Much credit is due also to Capt. Fitzgerald, for the admirable manner in which he filled up the great cylinder, and protected it from water, and also to Capt. Bowman, the Assistant Master Attendant. Never was an undertaking completed, which rebounded more to the credit of all engaged, than this blowing up the wreck of the Ephraïm.

— It is stated that Lord Auckland will reside three weeks at Agra.

— The new Rajah of Sattarah has engaged to expend 10,000 Rupees in the formation of a lake at the Mubabul-Sur Hills. The old Rajah is to be sent to Benares.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 17.

— Mr. Cochran, the Company's Standing Council, having resigned the appointment, Mr. Longueville Clark has been appointed to act; but the sanction of Lord Auckland, and the confirmation of the Court of Directors are required to give permanence to the appointment. It is greatly to be desired, that both in this case, and in that of the Advocate Generalship, the authorities at home may ratify the choice of the Local Government.

— The English troops have had their first brush with the Usher Tartars. A party of them, headed by the son of the Chief of Kooloon, came down to Lygham, a place about 31 miles north of Baulian; and Dr. Lord, the Political Agent, immediately sent to order them away, on pain of being driven back. The threat was followed by a prompt march over two very rough passes. The English troops came up rather unexpectedly on the party, for the Chief's breakfast was on the fire. The enemy no sooner saw our soldiers, than they took to flight. This, however, will be a good lesson to them; and they will learn that the English can make forays as well as battles.

— Lieut. Alfred Pottinger and Dr. Ritchie have arrived at Baulian from Herat. Instead of adopting the usual route to Cabul, they took a circuitous journey by Meimuna.

— Mr. Campbell, who was so long in the service of Dost Mahomed, has come in; and it is said will accept of service under Shah Sujah. This is the officer, regarding whom fears were entertained, lest he should be put to death for refusing to fight his countrymen. But Mr. Campbell was born at Pondicherry.

— Further accounts have been received of the hurricane at Coringa. It appears to have been most disastrous. Every vessel in the river, and for miles up, is on shore. Of the vessels outside, all, with the exception of seven, have been wrecked. Coringa is nearly washed away. The light-house and all gone. Captain Pendergrass, of the Catherine, and Captain Marshall, of the Charles Dunerger, are both drowned.

— A pyrotechnic exhibition at the Catholic Church, at Howrah, in honour of the festival of the Novena, on Saturday last, attracted a large concourse of people.

— A case of horrid cruelty was discovered in Calcutta a day or two ago. Constable Hamilton returning from his rounds late at night, perceived a female on the Doombollah road recumbent, almost half dead, with a child only six weeks old in her arms. She was the lawful wife of a Mr. Hutton, of Doombollah, who had just assaulted her in this brutal manner, and turned her out of doors.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18.

— The 25th of January is fixed for the despatches of the next Mail from Bombay to Suez.

— Letters from Midnapore state that the rice crop in most parts of that district had failed, as it has failed also in Cuttack. A famine will be the consequence; the Arreath, which has resulted from the system of the British Government of India.

— We regret to learn that the recent reduction of the postage of letters has not produced such an increase of gists to the mill as to protect the department from loss. Several improvements projected by Dr. Ranken, are, therefore, folded up for the present.

— H. M. S. Algerine, has been sent with despatches to Suez. She conveys 1,486 letters.

TEMPERANCE BOND.

A friend to whom we beg to return our best thanks, has enabled us to lay the following extract of a letter from Limerick before our readers. It will be read with much interest by those who advocate the great cause of Temperance.—Ed.

"A most unexpected, novel, moral revolution, is now taking place in this province of Munster amongst numerous individuals who were in the habits of ruinous practice in drinking ardent spirits. A priest in Cork, named Mathews, has contrived some real or delusive charm, by which, with aid of an oath, and giving a medal or printed card, he binds the drinking penitents to leave off the use of all strong drink for ever! Men flock to him in car fulls from all parts, in full confidence to get this charm; and they way to Cork many take a parting leave of the whiskey, and a few have died of so doing, before they could get there; those who return seem quite altered beings. A Society of these reformed toppers, of about 500, is said to be now here, gathered from former folly. This may prove a great blessing, if followed up—but it is a sad reduction to the incomes of distillers and spirit retailers, yet must proportionably serve the grocery trade, &c. &c., of which there is a visible increase of shops."

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—I wish, through the channel of your paper, to direct attention to the fact, that although Calcutta boasts of its Chamber of Commerce, in the Mofussil a large portion of the trading community are totally unprotected. I shall leave assertion for illustration, and for the latter I shall select three cases out of a legion.

1st. Some merchants from Cashmere sold a powerful Native sodie shawl, to the amount of 4,000 Rupees. He gave his bond, promising payment in such and such a time; at the expiration of which, the merchants returned, and demanded payment, without avail. It may be said they had a redress in civil action. To these parties a civil action was a mere mockery, for how could they afford to stay in exile for a year or so, waiting the result of civil action? Now these had paid most heavily to our up-country contractors, for I saw their Permits. Surely they were entitled to protection.

2ndly. The River Merchant. I had an application from one to compel payment, and he actually filed the receipts for the delivery of the goods, stating, moreover, that the purchaser would leave the station the next day. Now what redress was there in a civil action to this party to which I was obliged to refer him?

3dly. A man from Cuttack proceeded to Assam, and laid out the whole of his money on elephants. He purchased five of which on his way home, he sold to a royal officer Native. It is an Irishman to say he sold it, for he never was sold. Detained, month by month, the remaining four died, as he had no longer the means to provide them with any grain. Now this man lost every thing—and what redress was a civil action to him?

In all these cases immediate redress was required. Now has the Magistrate been vested with the powers of a Commissioner of the Court of Requests, redress would have been promptly obtained by the aggrieved; and in each of these cases, as in a hundred of others, the parties would have blessed Heaven for a good Government, and gone on their way rejoicing.

With these illustrations for you to form a judgement, I would ask you, Mr. Editor, why this Magistrate should not be vested with the powers of a Commissioner of the Court of Requests, as regards the itinerant trading and commercial community. The Magistrate, I say, in preference to the Judge, because there are many stations where there are no Judges; and the cases I have adduced, occurred where there were none.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
PHOTICTON.

We regret that the length to which our remarks on the meeting of the Landholders' Society have extended, oblige us to postpone our remarks on this letter to the next week.—Ed.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

THE REVIVALS AT KILPATRICK, &c.—The religious awakening in the parish of Kilpatrick having begun at the close of the last communion, in July, an earnest desire was soon afterwards expressed by the people to repeat the observance of that solemn ordinance, and the minister and session cordially concurring in this desire, after due deliberation, fixed Sabbath last for its celebration. This having become generally known, an immense concourse of Christians was attracted to the place. Towards the end of the previous week, a great number of persons from various parts of the country had taken up their residence in the town to be present on the occasion, and such was the willingness with which the people accommodated them, that we have not heard of any who were disappointed. On Thursday a fast-day was kept, and the great body of the people abstaining from their ordinary employments, and repairing to the house of God, where there were three services, conducted by Mr. Burns, of Edinburgh; Dr. Malan, of Geneva; and Mr. Macneigh, of Paisley. On Friday evening there was a sermon by Mr. Middleton, of Strathmidge; and on Saturday a large congregation assembled in a field adjoining the town, and was addressed in a most scriptural and judicious manner from the text, "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth," by Mr. Burns, of Dundee. In the evening Mr. Sommerville, of Anderson, preached in the church. On Sabbath there could not be fewer assembled than twelve or fifteen thousand persons, and seldom has such a solemn and interesting scene been witnessed. The church bell rang at nine o'clock, and the service commenced both in the church and at the tent shortly before ten. The church was densely crowded, and the number present at the tent last evening was estimated variously at from ten to fifteen thousand. Our own impression is that it did not much exceed ten thousand. The action sermon was preached by Mr. Burns, the excellent and judicious minister of the parish, from the text, "I am the bread of life; he that cometh to me shall never hunger; he that believeth on me shall never thirst." The tables were afterwards fenced by Mr. Brown, and were then served successively by Mr. Burns; Mr. Martin, of Bathgate; Mr. Dempster, of Denny; Mr. Brown; Mr. Sommerville; Mr. Duncan, of Kirkcaldy; Mr. Rose, of Glasgow; and Dr. Dewar, of Aberdeen. About thirteen hundred persons communicated, and, in order to avoid the undue prostration of the services, the whole of the lower area of the church was occupied by the communicants. Mr. Burns stated at the close that upwards of eighty new communicants had been admitted, their ages varying from thirteen to seventy, and he never before had so much pleasure in conversing with persons desiring admission to the ordinance. Mr. Rose delivered the concluding sermon, which commenced, without any interval at about seven o'clock. In the tent, and from a stair adjoining the church, sermons were preached during the day by Dr. Dewar, Mr. Burns, Jun., Mr. Rose, Mr. Martin, and Mr. Dempster; and, in the evening, Mr. Burns, Jun., preached to an audience of several thousands by moon-light. Next to the impudic number assembled at the tent, nothing struck us more, in the appearance of the audience, than the large proportion of men in the crowd; there must have been two or three for every female. The solemnity and order of the various audiences were remarkable, and we have heard different persons say they never enjoyed so delightful a communion. The sermons were plain, scriptural, and searching, without any thing having an undue tendency to excite. On Monday, as on the fast-day, there were three services, conducted during the day by Dr. Dewar and Mr. Burns, Jun., in the tent, and in the evening by Mr. Burns in the church, after which a very solemn meeting for prayer was held, as there had been the previous evening, which continued to a late hour. We understand the sacrament was dispensed at the same time in the Relief Church. We earnestly hope this large concourse of ministers and Christians will be blessed as the means of spreading the revivals to other parts of the country.

The Glasgow Chronicle, in several particulars, confirms the foregoing accounts. It adds, however:—"Much excitement has prevailed, and scenes of a most deplorable nature have been exhibited. On one hand was to be seen the baptismal rite administered to great numbers, by immersion in the mill-dam, and on another, women throwing themselves on the ground, and crying out for mercy. Nor was the language of the preachers calculated to calm the storm. One reverend gentleman told a portion of his audience that "he saw the devil looking out of their eyes," on which several women fell down insensible, and were taken off to the session-house. At another time the preacher, in speaking of Jacob's ladder as a type of the altar, called on his hearers to come to it, and to make use of it, but finding the impression he produced not strong as he wished, he cried out that there was rottenness at the foot, and they must come quickly; and smiling the action to the word, he sprang up in the pulpit as if to catch hold of the ladder by a high spar, ere it was snatched away from him. On this, as on previous occasions, the chief actors in the scene were the clergy and the numbers. The male minority of the hearers appeared to be chiefly outsiders.

In reference to the account given by the Chronicle, the Scottish Guardian says:—"We do not ourselves believe in the truth of the charges to which we have alluded, and we have met with many most intelligent and excellent persons who throughout the long services at Kilpatrick saw nothing but what was worthy of commendation, and heard no preaching, or even expressions of preaching, but what were sober, solid, and scriptural. This in such novel circumstances is not saying little."—Scottish Guardian.

REVIVAL AT FINESTOCK.—We some time ago made reference to the fact, that religious excitement, similar to that displayed in the parish of Kilpatrick, had, to a considerable degree, manifested itself in the adjoining parish of Finestock, and that there, as well as in Anderson Church, religious worship was celebrated daily, and even occasionally extended to an hour far beyond midnight. Since that intimation the religious fervour has rather increased than diminished. A temporary place of worship was a few weeks ago opened in a building connected with Mr. Nisbet's work, but it was utterly inadequate for the accommodation of the crowds who assembled; and Anderson Church, of which Mr. Sommerville is pastor, was, in addition, opened for the reception of the worshippers. Here sermons are preached every night, and so great has been the attraction, that, though the church is a large one, sometimes as many people have been stationed without as within. The services are usually conducted by clergymen belonging to the city, and, generally speaking, they have been gone about with sobriety and moderation, though on occasional outbreaks, resembling those at Kilpatrick, have taken place among the audiences. These were more informal, have been common during the sermons of one gentleman, in particular whose denunciations of wrath have often been such as to rouse the fears of his audience to an extraordinary pitch. As an example of the style of preaching adopted by this clergyman, take the following:—"After speaking of the nature of the punishment which the wicked would experience in a future state, and describing the 'burning pit' in terms so horrid as to make the hair of his hearers almost stand on end, he, in the most confident manner, assured the audience that, if they did not accept the promised salvation that night, hundreds of them would never have the power to do so again,—hundreds of them would never see God in mercy, but to a certainty! He concluded with the horrors of the place he had just been describing. No wonder after such a doctrine as this, that people should be overcome with terror! We are happy to state, however, that the preachers, generally, have confined themselves to a statement of the generally received Christian doctrine of salvation, without any accompaniment of extravagant or eccentricity. At present, little else is talked of in Glasgow but the 'revivals,' and great diversities of views is expressed in regard to them. Individual cases of eccentricity or extravagance, however, are not in such a question to be looked upon as founded upon as arguments."—Glasgow Argus.

Last night the Rev. William Burns preached in the high Church, Paisley, to a crowded audience, consisting indifferently of both Churchmen and Dissenters. The sermon was the most serious and attractive description, and delivered with a degree of ability seldom surpassed. The impression in the mind of the great majority was, that they had never heard so able an orator so attractively discourse. The blessing was pronounced at midnight, and up to that hour the passages, stairs, porches, and every corner of the building was crowded to excess. We understand that the desire to hear Mr. Burns is so great, that yesterday he had to preach for about an hour, when on his passage west in the great coal-truck-bus!—Glasgow Chronicle.

REVIVAL AT KILPATRICK.—We do not find ourselves in condition to fulfil the promise made in our last, that we should give a particular account of the origin and progress of this war. The time has not yet arrived for giving such a narration, as the necessary comments and observations. At present, we can assure our readers, that the excitement is in no manner abated; that, while, every corner of individuals falling into different mind, and others obtaining relief; that the churches continue to be crowded, even during the common evenings of the week meetings for prayer and mutual exhortation; and that the cases which formerly worship is not observed are the exception. Thus there is mingled in it a portion of human infirmity which at the more the beauty of the work, and on which the scorner may lay hold in his attempts to discredit the whole; yet, after another month's observation, we continue in the belief formerly expressed, that the great preponderance of the work is genuine, and such that the Church of Christ will permanently rejoice for it.—Christian Journal for October.

HOMERTON COLLEGE.—The Rev. Daniel Goffey Bishop has resigned his office as classical tutor in this College, in consequence, we understand, of a change in his religious views. Mr. Bishop has for some time avowed his predilections for the Established Church.—Ibid.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—On the 19th ult. the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Inverness executed the goods of Hugh Fraser, parish schoolmaster of Kirkhill, who had been found guilty of violating one of the statutes of the Church, by attempting to partake of the Lord's Supper when not in communion with the Church, and though warned by the minister of the illegality of the conduct.—Ibid.

NORWICH.—The congregation under the care of the Rev. John Alexander, Norwich, having had to paint and enlarge their own chapel, have for the last two months been worshipping in the Dutch Church, which was kindly lent to them by the Court of Guardians. The chapel, which is a spacious building, was originally the conventual church of the Black Friars. Many years ago, it was occupied by a congregation of Dutch settlers; and it is now used as the chapel of the Court, in which a clergyman preaches every Lord's-day. During Mr. Alexander's occupation of it, he has preached in the morning and in the evening of each Sabbath, and the clergyman in the afternoon. On one of the Sundays, the sermon in the afternoon was preached by the Bishop of Norwich; so that the same pulpit, on the same day, was occupied twice by a dissenting minister, and once by the Bishop of the Diocese. We are not aware that any injury has been done to either party by this manifestation of Christian charity; and we are quite sure that the good bishop and the Independent minister, who cordially shook hands after the service, will reflect on it with pleasure and with gratitude.—Ibid.

BRADFORD.—MISSIONARY EDUCATION.—On Wednesday, the 9th inst., the Rev. Joseph Waddington, late a student in Aitchison College, was ordained to the work of a Missionary in Barbadoe, South America.—Ibid.

EDUCATION.

UNIVERSITY REFORM IN SCOTLAND.—We are glad to find our own university (St. Andrew's) beginning to bestir itself, and to shake off the lethargy so fatal to its own constitution, as well as to the public interest.

And, first, as regards the improvement in the course of instruction. Hereto we are glad to find the Senate acting up, by the introduction of civil engineering, chemistry has applied to the arts, the practical application of political economy, the philosophy of the senses, and the modern languages, as a part of the college curriculum. The first of these branches is so indispensable to the engineer and machinist, so much in demand for canals, railways, tunnels, bridges, harbours, deepening of rivers, &c., that its profession has within the last twelve years become one of the most lucrative and honourable. Taught by such accurate and experienced practitioners as Mr. Duncan, Anderson and Briggs, the course will be, as engineering requires, one of utility, and cannot fail to be an acquisition to the united college. The second department is one on which bleaching, dyeing, tanning, extracting metallurgy, and a thousand other arts so intimately depend, that it will recommend itself—and taught by one whose early life was spent in its practice, it comes doubly recommended to the student. The third course is now so necessary to the commerce of our country, the banker, the diplomatist, and trader, that we only wonder why it has not long ere now been introduced. The fourth, offered gratuitously by the learned principal, will have a salutary influence on the previous metaphysical education of the senior students, and must have a powerful tendency to direct their minds to deep and correct reflection. The fifth is not so thoroughly necessary to men of all ranks, trades, and professions, that no university would be complete without it. The works of the continental countries, equally learned and scientific with our own, are so requisite to the scholar and gentleman, that without a knowledge of the modern languages no man can lay claim to the title of either.

Secondly.—The abolition of the fees for the degrees of Bachelor and Master of Arts will have a powerful influence in stimulating the student to such honourable distinctions. He will now see that it is a point of knowledge and industry, and not, as heretofore, conditionally depending on pecuniary ability. There will be no excuse for his not obtaining the distinction, but one, and that one will not be much to his credit.

We are especially pleased with the third innovation—viz., the bringing back of the honorary gifts to the original limits of the endowment. It is just, and honourable as just. Merit will now more frequently be rewarded, while the pretensions to wealthy friends, and other injudicious applications, will be prevented. The Senate deserves unqualified thanks for this move, for, under the old regime, the abuse on this score was truly disgraceful.

Such are the changes already announced in the direction and course of instruction, and we are assured that further improvements are about to be adopted. We do not allude to requisitions of course of matters of mere academic discipline; these are all very well, and must come in their turn. In the judicious adaptation, more than in the enactment, must lie the merit of the Senate, and we are happy to learn that the library, one of the most essential portions of the university, is about to undergo a broad and liberal reform. The introduction of a chair for natural history is likewise talked of.—Fife Herald.

A NEW EDUCATIONAL ESTABLISHMENT is about to be founded in Liverpool, under the title of the "Liverpool Collegiate Institution." John Gladstone, Esq., has contributed considerably towards its funds. Lords Francis Egerton and Sandon have likewise placed their names amongst the donors, and consented to become Vice-Presidents. The bishop of the diocese has accepted the office of visitor.—Liverpool Mail.

PUBLIC EDUCATION IN IRELAND.—A Parliamentary Return just printed shows how large an amount of assistance has been rendered by the Irish National Board of Education in the instruction of the people since its establishment in 1801. It has aided in the building of no less than five hundred and fifty-five schools in seven years, at an expense of 41,819*l.*, for building, 5,883*l.*, for fitting up, 12,484*l.*, for salaries, and 3,771*l.* for requisites. It has given assistance to 1,019 schools previously in operation, to the amount of 2,270*l.*, for building, 6,803 for fitting up, 51,011*l.* for salaries, and 11,233*l.* for requisites. The number of children on the roll in those schools up to September, 1858, was 104,026 males and 78,839 females—total 182,865. The sum disbursed in seven years in the promotion of education is 339,255*l.* The schools built are pretty equally distributed through the different provinces—183 being in Ulster, 100 in Munster, 145 in Leinster, and 125 in Connaught—total 553. Of the schools before in existence, and aided by the Board, 368 were in Ulster, 229 in Munster, 329 in Leinster, and 99 in Connaught—total 1,019. Of these, 306 have ceased, from one cause or other, to be connected with the Commissioners of Education. It is impossible to consider the above facts ever so slightly, without perceiving that the Irish National Board of Education, which the Tories have so perseveringly maligning has been immensely beneficial in extending education in Ireland; and the Education of the people of the country cannot be advanced without, at the same time, advancing the moral and intellectual character of the people, diminishing all the dangers of Ireland, and strengthening the dictates of law and order.—Leeds Mercury.

LECTURES TO MECHANICS.—A series of public lectures has been commenced by ministers in connection with the Christian Instruction Society, on the Evidence and Doctrines of Christianity, at Hoxton Academy Church. The first service was held on the 3rd inst., when the Rev. Thomas Archer presided, the subject being, "The Condition of the World at the Advent of Christ; and the expectation then prevalent of his appearance;" on the 10th, the Rev. J. Aldis lectured on "The Nature and Necessity of Faith in the Mission of the Son of God;" on both of which occasions the chapel was crowded, principally by persons of the description for whom the lectures were designed. The Rev. Dr. Bennett is advertised to preach on Thursday next, on "Historical Confirmation of Facts recorded in the New Testament." A weekly list of subjects has been announced, which will continue the services until the close of the year. We are happy to find the committee are also making arrangements for lectures in other parts of the town of "Mechanics," and interesting subjects. Lectures on the latter subject are also announced by the Committee of the City Mission.—Ibid.

MORAL PHILOSOPHY CHAIR, GLASGOW COLLEGE.—This chair, now vacant by the death of Professor Milne, one of the most celebrated in our College, Dr. Francis Hutcheson, who is pronounced by Sir James Mackintosh, in his "Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy," to be the father of speculative philosophy in Scotland, and who, according to a laudable report, by his works and lectures, contributed to diffuse the love for moral discussion in this country, has lately effected the production of some of the most valuable writings of the eighteenth century, held the chair from 1730 to 1743. In 1762, upon the demise of Mr. Thomas Craigie, who held the professorship for six years, Adam Smith, the author of the "Wealth of Nations," was advanced from the Logic chair to that of Moral Philosophy. He was succeeded by Dr. Thomas Reid, the author of the celebrated "Inquiry into the Powers of the Human Mind, as they relate to the Common Sense," who held the chair for thirteen years. In 1795, Mr. Arthur was appointed professor, and is known as the author of a valuable collection of essays on the philosophy of sense and criticism. In 1797 he was succeeded by Mr. Dugald Stewart, who held the chair for 42 years, and who has acquired a high reputation. The paragon of this chair is Dr. James Watson, the D.D., and Principal, and Professor of the Philosophy of Glasgow College, who held the chair for 22 years, and who has

Education in Bedfordshire.—The report of the champion respecting the prisoners of the county gaol at Bedford, in 1853, states "that their great leading characteristic was ignorance, heathenish ignorance of the simplest truths." At Midsummer Quarter Session he reported, that "as to the condition, mentally and morally, of his unhappy charge, he regretted to say it could scarcely be more ignorant or degraded. It was his conviction that no pen could depict in colours sufficiently dark the moral and spiritual ignorance and debasement of the vastly greater number of those unhappy beings who pass through the prison."—Put.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE DUKE OF BEDFORD AND DUELLING.—A correspondent of the Morning Herald of the 12th inst. and an old one of this journal (J. P. D.) in a letter containing strong moral and historical arguments against the practice of duelling, makes the following allusion to this highly respected nobleman. "Allow me to mention, as a contrast, an anecdote of a nobleman, whom I desire to speak of here solely as a man with no reference to political or family connexion. In the year 1823 a duel was fought between the Dukes of Buckingham and Bedford. The Duke of Bedford received a congratulatory address on his escape, from his own neighbourhood, but not containing any protest against the circumstance. Though not called upon, however, to explain, the Duke volunteered a confession of self-condemnation to the following effect:—'It is possible for a person in a rash hour to deviate from the principles which have actuated the whole of his life. Having done so, I much regret, and would certainly never repeat it.' There is to me a higher spirit, and indubitably a better example to posterity in the apology than in justification."—Northampton Mercury.

THE QUEEN'S GENEROSITY.—A poor woman residing in Aberdeen, and originally belonging to the parish of Culcairn, aged nearly 90, the widow of a soldier of the 92nd, one of a host of Spain and Portugal, from fatigue and previous wounds, lately sent a petition to Her Majesty, stating her situation. In course of ten days, a letter was sent from Lord Hill to the Commanding Officer of the Aberdeen barracks, enclosing the sum of 10*l.*, as a present from Her Majesty, for the temporary relief of this now helpless woman. Aberdeen Herald.

THE NEW HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT.—On Friday, pursuant to notice, the tenders for the third contract for the new House of Parliament, comprising the whole of the river front, and returns or wings of the building, were opened before the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Board of Works, when, after a spirited competition, as will be seen from the subjoined account of tenders put in by some of the most celebrated builders in the metropolis, the contract was decided in favour of Messrs. Girdell and Peto, the well-known builders of the York-road, Lambeth, Messrs. Girdell and Peto, 130, 71st St. Baker, 167, 74th St. Cubitt, 174, 42nd St. Wilson, 177, 89th St. Lee, 179, 38th St. Girdell and Peto, 181, 88th St. Piper, 183, 102nd St. Hicks, 183, 69th St. and Bennett, 184, 63rd St. It is expected that three years will expire before the above contract will be finished, and that it will be ten years ere the structure will be fully completed. Put.

GRENADEER T. CASTLES.—Before the invention of gunpowder the number of castles, erected chiefly as places of security, was very great; but since, few have been built, and those have not been as places of defence. There were 1,100 castles built in England between the years 1140 and 1154.—Mid.

LORD SPENCER AND MR. SELWEN.—AWARD.—We, the undersigned, having been appointed to decide the match proposed by Mr. Selwen to show 100 Sussex beats, of his own breed, against 100 of any other breed in England, bred by the same person, and which was accepted by Earl Spencer, with 100 short horns, and having carefully inspected the respective herds on Mr. Selwen's farm at Beekley, in Sussex, on Earl Spencer's farm at Brampton, in Northamptonshire, and at Wiseton, in Nottinghamshire, we do hereby declare Earl Spencer to be the winner, and direct the stakes to be paid to his Lordship accordingly; at the same time we consider Mr. Selwen's stock to possess great merit, and great uniformity of character.—Dated this 27th day of November 1854. (Signed) John Palsall, William South.—South Express.

CALEDOONIAN CANAL.—The Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to consider and report on the state of the Caledonian Canal, and what steps ought to be taken with reference thereto, have published the result of their deliberations. The opinion of the committee is embodied in the following resolutions, which form part of the document.—1. That the insecure condition of the works on the Caledonian Canal, as detailed in the report of Mr. Walker, has been fully established by the evidence adduced before the committee. 2. That the state of the canal calls for the immediate attention of Parliament, not only with reference to the preservation of the works, but also as regards the security of life and property in portions of the districts through which the canal passes:—3. That this committee cannot recommend the abandoning or shutting up the canal, on account of the large but unknown sum which must be expended to accomplish these objects, independent of the claims for compensation which may be expected to be preferred by those interested in its maintenance. 4. That the committee is of opinion that the unfinished state of some portions of the works of the canal, and the imperfect execution of other parts—the want of a sufficient depth of water—and the absence of steam tugs on the great Highland locks, have prevented the development of those benefits to commerce which might reasonably have been expected to result from its construction. 5. That this committee is of opinion that considerable benefit would arise to the commerce of several of the large and important northern sea ports, were the works of the canal placed in an efficient state of repair, its depth increased, and the assistance of steam tugs afforded, as recommended in the report of Mr. Walker. 6. That this committee, therefore, recommends that a sum not exceeding 300,000*l.* should be placed at the disposal of the Government, to be expended in the repair and improvement of the canal, under the authority of an act of Parliament, which should be procured for this purpose. Put.

THE KING OF HOLLAND.—The following statement respecting the contemplated marriage of the King of Holland is contained in the Commerce Delo:—"We know from an undoubted source that King William persists in his resolution, and that it is not a left-handed marriage he intends to contract, but a full and legitimate union, attended with all the forms of royalty. His family, or rather two of his children, Prince Frederick and Princess Marianne, had, by earnest entreaties, on finding it impossible to overcome his Majesty's decision, obtained a promise that the Countess d'Ostremont should not be raised to the throne; but the King, having found that secret intrigues were carried on, within as well as without his States, against the new dynasty, decided to pay no attention to the slyly insinuated wishes of his children, and the unbecoming murmurs of his subjects. After a long explanation, however, with his son-in-law, Prince Albert of Prussia, the Princess Marianne, his consort, Prince Frederick and his Princesses, they all announced to him that they and their families would withdraw from the league. To his Majesty coldly replied, that they were not at liberty to do as they liked, and so he was, and that he should not change his mind to please them. The Prince of Orange presides as a strict neutrality, and consequently, is more than ever in the good graces of his father."

AS IS THE FATHER, SO IS THE SON.—Sheridan, having threatened his son Tom to cut him off with a shilling, received this retort:—"Where will you get it?"—Put.

AN AGED GOOSE.—A goose on a farm in Scotland, about ten years since, of the clearly ascertained age of eighty-one years, healthy and vigorous, was killed, whilst sitting over her eggs, by a sow; it was supposed she might have lived still many years, and her fecundity appeared to be permanent. Other geese have been proved to reach the age of seventy years. It is a well authenticated fact, that, in 1824, there was a goose living in the possession of Mr. Henson, of Glenham, near Market Rasen, Lincolnshire, which was then upwards of a century old. It had been throughout that term in the constant possession of Mr. Henson's forefathers and himself, and on quiring his farm, he would not suffer it to be sold with his other stock, but made a present of it to the incoming tenant, that the venerable fowl might terminate its career on the spot where its useful life had been spent such a length of days.—The Poultry Yard.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE DAGUERTYPE.—Amongst the numerous improvements proposed in the daguerotype is the following, by Mr. Johann, of Brussels, for taking portraits A photograph.—"Paint in dead white the face of the patient; powder his hair, and fix the back of his head between two or three plaques solidly attached to the back of an arm-chair and wound up with screws! The colour of the flesh, not reflecting sufficiently the rays of light, would require a powerful sun, whereas a whitened face will be re-produced as well as larger figures by diffused light."—Put.

PARIS, Oct. 1.—The crisis in the United States has already produced an injurious effect upon the commerce of Lyons, where the workmen in the silk manufactures are likely to be thrown out of employment during the ensuing winter. Estimates to the amount of about 15,000,000*fr.* have just been declared as Grenoble and Vienna, in the department of France.—Mid.

ECONOMY IN CANDLES.—If you are without a rush-light, and would burn a candle all night, unless you use the following precaution, it is ten to one an ordinary candle will gutter away in an hour or two, sometimes to the endangering the safety of the house. This may be avoided by placing as much common salt, finely powdered, will reach from the tallow to the bottom of the black part of the wick as a penny burnt candle, when, if the same be lit, it will burn very slowly, yielding a sufficient light, and will elapse; the salt will gradually sink as the tallow is consumed, the melted tallow lying down through the salt and condensed, in the wick.—The Economist.

BANISH AND BANISHMENT.—"I guess," said the philosophical supercilious, Jonathan Downing, when he wrote home from Canton to his uncle the major, "that there really be two sets of good government in the nature of things—banish, or the like, as in China; and bamboo, or the like as in the old country. But we in the States use 'em both, and ours is the grandest government in the universe, bamboo for the niggers, and bamboo for ourselves."—Pat.

DEATH OF HER MAJESTY'S FAVOURITE MONKEY.—Some short time since a present was made to her Majesty of a young, active, and very knowing monkey; and it was duly domiciled in a cage manufactured expressly for him, and placed in one of the apartments at Windsor Castle. Jocko, who understood nearly every thing that was said to him, was a very great favourite of her Majesty, and of many about the Court. Early last week symptoms of indigestion manifested themselves, and Jocko continuing to get worse, the attendance of Mr. Cross, of the Surrey Zoological Gardens, was commanded at the Castle. Mr. Cross arrived at Windsor on Saturday morning last, but too late to save the Royal favourite. He was then placed in a warm bath, and afterwards wrapped up in flannel, and in that state expired the same evening. The disease which carried off Jocko was consumption, a disorder which is the cause of death, to nine-tenths of the monkey tribe in this country.—Id.

HUNDERSFIELD MARKET. October 1.—There was a decided improvement in the market to-day, the demand for almost every description of woollen goods being animated. Superfine broads may, perhaps, be quoted as being still difficult to sell, but even in them there is an evident move for the better. The fine weather has given an impulse, by inspiring confidence; and, as stocks in the country are well known to be very small, a good autumn trade is expected. The woadsops continued doing a fair business.—Manchester Guardian.

ROCHDALE FLAX-MILL-MARKET. Monday, Sept. 26.—There is yet a steady demand for flax; but the manufacturers complain of the prices being too low to remunerate them for their labour. In the woad-market there is little change, except broken and skin wool is quoted a shade lower.—Id.

A LONG STORY.—M. Hovengrant, ex-Member of the Council des Cinquante, has written the history of Tournai, his native town. A fact unprejudiced and literary annals, he has extended it to the 11th printed volume. M. Hovengrant is advanced in age, but not in his good will, when it was feared that his "History of Tournai" would stop at its 114 volume; but his indefatigable chronicler has since found an obliging neighbor, who writes under his dictation, and the 115th volume of the "History of Tournai" will shortly be published.—Pat.

COIN LAWS, FRANCE.—Commercial restrictions and prohibitions are beginning to be viewed in their true light in France, not less than in England, and will soon be so viewed in all countries, where a public opinion exists to be addressed, and a free press to appeal to. There is no country, unless Russia, engaged in a more pervasively anti-commercial system than France, though it is less the fault of the present generation of Frenchmen than of the war policy, and the monstrous abortion entitled the Continental System. The Courrier Francais ascribes the late disturbances among the labourers of Lille and the rural population of the Sarthe to one common cause—the misery of the people, which, it says, proceeds, on the one hand, from the high price of bread, and on the other, from the suffering condition of the commercial and manufacturing interests. The misery of the working classes is real, and it is not by addressing circular letters to the Prefects that the evil can be remedied. The Government accordingly recommends more efficient means, and first of all calls on the governments lower, by two or three francs, the limit of the tariff to which the importation of foreign wheat is liable; to reduce from 35 francs to 20 of the import duty on every bush of hard wheat; to conclude commercial treaties with England and the German Customs Union; to level the fiscal barrier raised between France, Belgium and Spain; and until deluges can thus be created for French industry, to employ the suffering population in opening new communications throughout the country. These are certainly more rational propositions than fighting for a Rhine frontier.—Globe.

EGYPT.—The Leipziger Gazette contains a letter dated Alexandria, the 8th ult. which states that Mehmet Ali still kept secret the defection of Ismail Pasha and of Aliet Ali (Pasha of Konia), and continued to reply to the inquiries of the foreign consuls on the subject that he knew nothing respecting it. No doubt, however, appeared to rest on the affair. The schooner sent to Scanderoun to convey the two traitors to Alexandria was expected every moment at the latter port on its return. The two fleets were in a deplorable state. The crews of the Egyptian fleet had not had any pay during a long period. Five money brought by the Turkish fleet was nearly exhausted. The treasury of the country was such that the purses for the arsenal and dockyards were suspended, a circumstance severely felt by the manufacturers of Cairo.—Pat.

THE ROYAL GEM.—There is now residing at Morden College, Blackheath, the only surviving officer of the Royal Gem, which is now exciting so much attention from the efforts which are being made for the destruction of the vessel. Mr. Webb, the gentleman alluded to, is upwards of 80 years of age, but still in the enjoyment of perfect health and faculties. His escape from this ill-fated vessel was a singular one, and a very few minutes before the catastrophe which caused the destruction of so many hundred lives, he left the vessel for the shore, in command of a boat's crew. After the boat had made a few strokes from the vessel, a midshipman, who was one of the company, requested permission to return on board, which was needed in, for the purpose of obtaining his dirk. The patience of the commander of the boat becoming exhausted in waiting for the return of the midshipman, they were ordered to pull towards the shore. This was scarcely responded to before the vessel capsized; amongst the lives lost being that of the young officer who went on board from the boat, on account of the trifling breach of etiquette which he had committed in being destitute of his sword.—Id.

THE "PRESS" AT EIGHTH-TOWN.—A stout baillie from Glasgow not being able to obtain a place at the Eighttown tournament, demanded from the attendant permission to enter the reporter's gallery, as the editor of the Lothian and Leith Journal. The gentleman was bowed into the best seat on the ground with all the ceremony due to a functionary connected with so distinguished a periodical.—Id.

RAILWAY MILEAGE DUTIES.—A table appended to the report of the railway committee shows the amount of mileage duty received from railways in England that have not compounded for the duties. From this table it appears that the London and Birmingham Company have paid from July, 1837, to January, 1839, the sum of 10,005, 12s. 1d.; the aggregate number of miles travelled during that period being 24,111,590. The Grand Junction, from July 4, 1837, to Jan. 1839, 17,032, 10s. 10d.; number of miles, 32,702,384. The Liverpool and Manchester, from Jan. 1839, to Jan. 1839, 21,397, 2s. 8 1/2d.; number of miles, 4,192,330. The London and South-Western, from May, 1838, to January, 1839, 1,324, 10s. 8 1/2d.; number of miles, 2,927,928. And the Great Western, from June 4, 1838, to Jan. 1839, 2,229, 10s. 1d.; number of miles, 4,280,048.—Railway Times.

THE IRON TRADE.—In our quarterly notices of the price of iron, and the general state of the iron-trade, we are always anxious to obtain the most correct information. The agents of the Staffordshire and Shropshire districts, at their preparatory meeting last week, determined, we understand, to maintain the prices as fixed the previous quarter-day. Most of the leading houses are, it is reported, in possession of extensive orders; whilst the merchants' stocks were scarcely ever known so low as at the present time. Railroad companies are still pouring in their orders for bars, engines, carriages, &c.; and, although many new works have recently been erected in this district, yet, from the state of the monetary affairs, they have been, as yet, and will for some time to come, be rendered impotent. Under all circumstances the trade may be considered on the whole in a very prosperous condition, as all who have the good fortune to be connected with the make of iron very readily acknowledge.—Birmingham Advertiser.

BOOKSTITCHES, especially of bookbinders and printers, have recently become so frequent in Paris, that upwards of eight hundred compositors and pressmen are thrown out of employment.—Pat.

DISHERITING LOVE.—John E. Lecon, Esq., has, in the most hands-on and disinclined manner, divided the large fortune left to him by his father, the late Sir E. K. Lecon, Bart., equally with his elder brother, Sir H. K. Lecon, Bart. The present baronet married, contrary to the desire of his father, a daughter of Mr. Hammett, a partner in the house of Eadell and Co., bankers. The old baronet never forgave this act of ingratitude in his eldest son, and, consequently, left nearly all to his younger son, J. E. Lecon, Esq., who, with noble feeling, has divided the property with his elder brother.—Cambridge Index.

CITY PAYMENT IMPROVEMENTS.—The carriage way in the Poultry and Cheapside has already been repaved on an improved principle, the mud and loose earth which had accumulated under the old pitching having been removed, and a layer of macadamising strewn on the surface, on which the new stones have been laid. King William-street, Cornhill, and Park Avenue, are undergoing a similar process; and a great improvement has also been effected by widening the roadway at the point of the great thoroughfare at the Mansion House.—Pat.

STRANGE OCCURRENCE.—Sometime ago, a Sheriff of a county in the southern part of Mississippi had received, in his official character, a large sum of money, say fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. Under a pretext of a call from home for a day or two, he placed the money in the keeping of his wife, whom he charged to take care of it. Late in the evening of the day on which he left home, a stranger of genteel appearance entered the house, and asked permission to pass the night. In asking to entertain a stranger during her husband's absence, the Sheriff's wife denied the request, and the stranger took no. Directly after his departure, however, the lady came to the conclusion that she had done wrong in refusing to take him in, and she sent a servant to recall him. The gentleman returned and soon retired to rest. Late in the night three men disguised as negroes, called up the lady, and demanded possession of the money left in her charge. Believing that there was no help for it, she at length told them that the money was in another room, and that she would go and get it for them. It so happened that the money had been deposited in the room occupied by the stranger; and on her going for it, she found him up and loading his pistols. He had been awakened by the noise, and had overheard most of the conversation between his hosts and the robbers. Telling the lady to be of good heart, he gave her a loaded pistol, and instructed her to go out and prevent the money to one of the robbers, and to shoot the fellow while in the act of doing so on her doing which, he (the stranger) would be ready for the other two. With a readiness and courage that it is difficult to conceive in woman, she did as directed, and the robbers fell dead at her feet. A sudden instant under the stranger's bullet he showed a second robber. The third attempted to escape, but was overtaken at the gate by the stranger, and fell under the thrust of his knife. As soon as practicable the neighbours were alarmed, and on waiting the point from the faces of the dead robbers, the one killed by the lady proved to be her own husband, and the two others a couple of their neighbours.—Journal of Hyderabad.

A COMMILITEE EXHIBIT.—At a recent aquatic excursion, certain distinguished persons from Birmingham to Dudley, having to pass through one of the canal boats, where boats are required to register certain particulars of the freight, &c. (to facilitate the collection of the proper dues) the following entry was made relative to one of the learning-laden barks:—Draught, 14 inches; weight, 2½ tons; cargo, philosophers!—Worcester Journal.

GLASGOW AND DUNDEE RAILWAY is getting on very rapidly, already a great part of the line is in a forward state. A number of houses in Tradeston are at present taking down to make way for the depot, and there are likewise several bridges being laid across the streets. Tradeston is in a complete stir, and within this time of railway is finished it will materially enhance the value of property both in Glasgow and Paisley.—Glasgow Chronicle.

REVENUE POLICE.—It is in contemplation to establish the new police constabulary system in the county of Wilt; the number of constables proposed is 120; the population of the county is about 250,000.—Lat.

WINCHESTER.—Mr. Robert Owen, who has taken a large tract of land at East Tynherly, near Stockbridge, is expected, with a body of his followers, about the latter end of this month.—Lat.

FRANCE.—THE NEW ABATTOIR, or slaughter-house for horses in the plain of La Verne near Aubervilliers, will probably be finished this month. The buildings, which are of stone, covered with tiles, occupy an area of 7,750 square yards, and are divided into four compartments. The slaughter-house, properly so called, is in the centre, and is composed of two oblong erections in compartments separated from each other by a spacious court. In an enclosure at the back of the yard are stalls for the horses; and at the western extremity is a laboratory with an elevated chimney, for preparing the animal matter for quinquer and agriculture. The foundation is so deeply and substantially laid, that it is believed to be impossible for rats or other vermin to get in.—Outing.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.—The Anglo-Burg Gazette of the 28th ult., in its Alexandria correspondence, of the 7th, persists in positively asserting that Hafez Pasha, the Turkish Commander-in-Chief, had passed over to Ibrahim, and that a corvette has been sent to Syria to conduct him to Alexandria.

GREATER YEMMA, GEORGIA.—Anglo-Burg Gazette of the 28th ult., has a letter from Constantinople of the 11th, mentioning that one-half of the town of Saizakia had been reduced to ashes. Several of the consular hotels had been consumed, and the French agent, who was dangerously wounded, had been able only to save the archives of the Consulate.

THE TYPOFACE.—The Bordeaux papers mention that a young sculptor of that city had discovered a method of taking casts of the human face, which, without requiring that the features should be reduced to a state of perfect rigidity, allows them to preserve all their natural play, and thus produces an exact resemblance with the animation of life. His name is Pellet, and he designs to use the apparatus the "Typoface".—Lat.

MILITARY.

GENERAL ORDERS.

The General having been most graciously pleased to appoint Lieutenant General Sir Jasper Nicolls, K.C.B., to be Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Forces serving in the East Indies, by a Commission of which was received at Calcutta, on the 14th November, and His Excellency has received Her Majesty's Orders, through the General Commanding in Chief in England, dated 14th September last, to proceed to take the Chief Command without loss of time, the Lieutenant General publishes Her Majesty's Commission, and directs that all reports and letters intended for his information and orders, shall be addressed, in the absence of the Adjutant General, Queen's Troops, to his Military Secretary, Head Quarters, Calcutta.

The Returns are to be transmitted, as at present, until further orders.

VICTORIA.

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen Defender of the Faith. To His Trusty and Well-beloved Sir George Nicolls, Knight Commander of the most Honourable Military Order of the Bath, Lieutenant General of Our Forces, Greeting. We, repeating especial Trust and Confidence in your prudence, courage, and fidelity, do hereby appoint you to be Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Forces in the East Indies, and in the several Forces serving in the Territorial Possessions of the East India Company during Our Pleasure. You are required to carefully and diligently to discharge the said Trust of Commanding-in-Chief of Our Forces by doing and performing all and all manner of things thereto belonging. And we do hereby command all our Officers and Soldiers who are or who shall be employed in our said Forces in the East Indies, to acknowledge and obey you as Commander-in-Chief of Our Forces aforesaid; and you are to observe and follow such Orders and Regulations from time to time as you shall receive from us, or from the General Commanding-in-Chief of Our Forces in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the time being, according to the Rules and Discipline of War, in pursuance of the Trust. We have hereby appointed you to sit at Our Court at Buckingham Palace, the 12th day of August, 1889, in the Third Year of Our Reign.

By Her Majesty's Command,

(Signed) NORMANBY.

Lieut.-General Sir JAMES NICOLLS, K.C.B., Commander-in-Chief of all the Land Forces serving in the Territorial Possessions of the East India Company.

The following officers are appointed to his Excellency's Personal Staff:

Lieutenant Colonel John Luff, 21st Fusiliers, to be Military Secretary.
 Captain Gustavus William Nicolls, 21st Fusiliers, to be Aide-de-Camp.

Lieutenant Gustavus N. Harrison, of the 68th Foot, to be Aide-de-Camp.

Major J. Byrne, Assistant Adjutant General of Her Majesty's Forces, will be pleased to join His Excellency at Calcutta by dawn, and to make arrangements for the earliest arrival at Head-quarters, by water, of the several Establishments under his charge.

On being apprized whither Command of so large a body of the Army, in which he has spent his life, Sir Jasper Nicolls cannot deny himself the pleasure of expressing, though briefly and feebly, his sense of the high honour conferred upon him. He has served at intervals with Her Majesty's Troops in India since 1862, during which time nearly half the Infantry of the Army have added in the glorious achievements by which this great Empire has been gained and secured to Great Britain.

The Commander-in-Chief is certain that the same great qualities of British soldiers will ever be displayed by the Corps in India, and it will be as much his pleasure, as his duty, to contribute, by every means in his power, to their comfort, happiness and honour.

JOHN LEARD, Lt. Col., Military Secretary.

The 7th December, 1889.

The Honourable the Court of Directors having, in a despatch dated 4th September last, announced to the Government of India that they appointed the Honourable Lieut. General Sir Jasper Nicolls, Knight Commander of the most Honourable Military Order of the Bath, to be Commander-in-Chief of the East India Company's Forces in India and an Extraordinary Member of the Council of India, and having forwarded the Commission for these appointments to the Governor-General of India to be delivered to Sir Jasper Nicolls when he should arrive in Calcutta, and the said Commission pre-termining that the said Lieutenant General Sir Jasper Nicolls is to take upon him the Command in Chief and office of Extraordinary Member of the Council of India, upon and from his assumption of the Command of Her Majesty's Forces in the East Indies, which the said Lieutenant General Sir Jasper Nicolls has just assumed, the President of the Council of India, in Council that he has done so, and is hereby notified that Lieutenant General Sir Jasper Nicolls has this day assumed the office of Commander-in-Chief of the Forces of the East India Company in India and has taken the Oath as an Extraordinary Member of the Council of India under the usual solemnities from the ramparts of Fort William.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE HONOURABLE THE PRESIDENT IN COUNCIL.

Fort William, 7th December, 1889.
 No. 207 of 1889.—His Excellency the Honourable Lieutenant General Sir Jasper Nicolls, Knight Commander of the most Honourable Military Order of the Bath, having been appointed by the Honourable the Court of Directors, in their letter to the President of the Council of India, dated the 4th September 1889, to be Commander-in-Chief of the Company's Forces in India, and also to be an Extraordinary Member of the Council of India, which appointments are to take effect upon and from his assuming the Command of Her Majesty's Forces in the East Indies, which, as Lieutenant General Sir Jasper Nicolls has reported, in the letter of His Excellency's Military Secretary, that he has this day done; the Honourable Court's orders, and the Commission appointing Lieutenant General Sir Jasper Nicolls, received with a letter from the Secretary at the East India House, dated 18th September, are now read.

The Office of being administered to Lieutenant General Sir Japer Nicolls, His Excellency has been seated as a Member of the Council of India, under the usual solemnities from the ramparts of Fort William.

Ordered, that the appointment of Lieutenant General Sir Jasper Nicolls be communicated to the Army in General Orders, and that the Commission constituting His Excellency Commander-in-Chief, be read with the usual ceremonies to the Troops in Garrison, and at the different stations of the Army.

Ordered, that all Returns of the Army be made in the usual manner to Lieutenant General Sir Jasper Nicolls, as Commander-in-Chief.

The Honourable the East India Company.

To all to whom these Presents shall come, send greeting. Know ye,
 That we the said Company, repeating especial Trust and Confidence in Lieut. General Sir Jasper Nicolls, Knight Commander of the most Honourable Military Order of the Bath, Commander-in-Chief of our Forces on the Fort Saint George Establishment—do by these Presents confer and appoint him the said Sir Jasper Nicolls, to be Commander-in-Chief of all our Military Forces which now are or may hereafter be employed in the East Indies, except such Forces as are or shall be employed in Our Service within the Port of Calcutta and Garrison of Fort William in Bengal and the Town of Calcutta, and in our Fort and Garrison of Fort Saint George and Town of Madraspatnam, and of our Fort and Garrison of Bombay, and except such Forces as shall from time to time be employed in our Service within the respective Presidencies of Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta, and within any Settlements or Places subordinate thereto, respectively, when he the said Sir Jasper Nicolls, shall not be detailed within such last mentioned Presidencies or Places, respectively, which office of Commander-in-Chief aforesaid the said Sir Jasper Nicolls is to take upon him, upon and from his assumption of the (Commanding) Her Majesty's Forces in the East Indies. And to hold and enjoy the same during Our pleasure, and until the contrary shall be signified under our Letters Patent, or under the hand of thirteen or more of our Court of Directors for the time being. And we do hereby authorize, empower and require him, the said Sir Jasper Nicolls, as Commander-in-Chief aforesaid, to the utmost of his skill and power to do and execute all such offices and Services as appertain to the Post of Commander-in-Chief of all our Military Forces in the East Indies, except as aforesaid, subject to such review or recall as can or may be made by any Law now in force. And subject to all such Rules, orders and Instructions as shall from time to time be received from our Court of Directors in writing, under the hands of thirteen or more of them, or from the Governor-General of India in Council or from the Governor in Council of Bombay, whenever he or within either of those Presidencies respectively, or at or within any Settlements or Places subordinate thereto, according to the Rules and Discipline of War, in pursuance of the trust hereby reposed in him, and we do hereby strictly require, charge and command all Commissioned Officers, Non-Commissioned officers, Soldiers and others belonging to our Military Forces in the several places before mentioned, except as aforesaid, to yield to him, the said Sir Jasper Nicolls, as their Commander-in-Chief, during his residence at or within such Presidencies or places as aforesaid, due obedience accordingly. And we do hereby revoke and annul all and every former Commission or Commissions, to any other person or persons whomsoever to act as Commander-in-Chief of our Forces in the East Indies, from the time that this present Commission shall take effect. Given under our Common Seal, this Thirteenth day of September, in the Thirtieth year of the reign of Our Sovereign Lady Victoria, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen Defender of the Faith, and in the Year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Thirty-nine.

STATE OF THE POLICE DURING THE FIRST SIX MONTHS OF 1839.—We have now been enabled to go through the Report of the State of the Police, in the first half of 1839, transmitted by the Superintendent, Mr. F. C. Smith, to Government.

Great uncertainty must always attend any estimate that is formed of the efficiency of the Police, under our present system. There is in all countries an indispotion to submit to the inconvenience and loss which invariably attend the prosecution of an offence; but that indispotion is increased tenfold in this country, by the distance of the Courts and the delays of justice, and, more than all, by the oppressions exercised by the Darogahs or Native Officers of Police, when they engage in the investigation of any act of theft, robbery or murder. Where the great aim of the people is to conceal crimes, under which they have suffered, less greater misfortunes should befall them, it is impossible to form a correct idea of the influence which the Police has exerted in the prevention or punishment of crime. The present Report can, therefore, be good only as far as it goes; it reasons well upon the data which have been obtained; but the mind cannot resist the conviction, that the fourth of the crimes committed have not been told. Though this must be self-evident from the nature and operation of our Police establishments, yet the Report itself gives abundant confirmation of it. In thirty-two districts, comprising a population of from thirty to forty millions of people, in which the transportation of goods by water is ten, yes, twenty to one, as compared with the land carriages, is it to be credited that the number of river Dacoities in six months, as the Report states, has not exceeded TWO? To come to another illustration. In the district of the Twenty-four Pergunnas, which comprises the country all round the Metropolis, in which crime is rife; in which not a day passes without thefts, burglaries and robberies; in which the insecurity of property is so appalling, that the Natives would fain, if they could, remove their valuables into the city—in this, perhaps, the worst district in the whole Presidency, owing to the vast mass of property it contains, and the inadequacy of the Police, it is reported that in six months there were just 65 thefts, 14 burglaries,—and no river Dacoity!! The Police can not be efficient when the vast majority of crimes are not so much as known. It is in vain that the Nizamut Adawlat establishes, as a test of the efficiency of the Police, that its heinous offences, the convictions shall be equal to the acquittals; it is in vain that Mr. Smith establishes a different test, by enquiring how many of the offences of former days have been traced up to the perpetrators, and punished. The true test of efficiency appears, in our humble judgment, to be the general security of property, and the general confidence of the people; and if we are to judge from the universal voice of the country, this test of success is yet wanting.

Mr. Smith inveighs, in bitter terms, against the Regulation of 1832, which forbids the public officers to take cognizance of thefts and burglaries, except at the requisition of the sufferers. On no fewer than twenty-one occasions, does he pour forth maledictions on this law. It is scarcely possible to use stronger language than he has employed in denouncing it. The operation of it, in the six months under review, is exhibited by the fact, that of 6524 cases of theft and burglary reported, only 2,171 have been required into, at the desire of the parties; 584 through a disregard of the Regulation, by order of the Magistrate; while 3,393 have not been examined at all. This is certainly an impunity for crime; but does not the unwillingness of the people to prosecute, prove incontrovertibly that there is some radical defect in our system? During this period, more than eleven thousand miscellaneous cases have been brought up to the Magistrate's Court, by the people themselves, notwithstanding the inconvenience both of travelling to a distance, and of being detained at the Court. Mr. Smith, at page 51 of the Report, states that the greatest objection the people entertain to complaints, is, in reality, "the leaving their homes, and the time they are to be absent from them and their business. A man who has to go fifty miles, knows that he can reach the Court in two or three days; if a hundred, in as many more; but he is in some measure at a loss how long he will be detained there; it may be only two or three weeks, or as many months." This is one cause of the repugnance of the people to prosecute. A still stronger objection is strongly presented to the mind of every Native, in the extortions to which the Darogah subjects his whole village, by threatening that, if he transport the guilty, "that is, an individual, to the Court, he will be put to death; he will be hanged, two, three or five miles, or months." Mr. Smith says, that the usual cause of the repugnance of the people to prosecute is this: "A Darogah is reported to the Magistrate, who immediately proceeds to the spot, and arrests the accused. He is bound, within forty-eight hours, to send the prisoners to the Magistrate." We say, in this statement, that every man in the country will say, NO! NO! NO!!! He does not arrest the accused; he goes to the village with his myriads; he calls upon every man of any property, and obliges him to pay down a certain sum, to exempt him from being sent up fifty or a hundred miles to the Magistrate. The forty-eight hours is spent in levying contributions on the innocent, not in hunting after the guilty. Since his hands have been tied up in reference to thefts and burglaries, a Dacoity is to him a kind of God send. It is this the people dread. They care little for the night plunderer; but the proud, ambitious, official day robber whom they dread; he comes with power and might to plunder those whom the robbers have spared. Till our system is reformed, so as to render it unnecessary for the people to go forty, fifty or a hundred miles for justice; till they can obtain efficient relief from the oppressions and extortions of the Darogahs, it would be an act of barbarous cruelty, unworthy of any Christian Government, to repeal the Act of 1832, and to compel the unhappy Natives to prosecute thieves and burglars; and thus to bring down upon them the direful inquest of the Darogahs. We dare not, as men, as Christians, repeal this law, till we have reformed our Police; and this even Mr. Smith appears to allow, when he says, in page 42, "the Government must lose no time to reform the Police, and then it will be practicable to repeal Reg. II. of 1832, with advantage to the country, which, I fear, cannot be the case under the system as it now stands."

We refrain from entering farther into the details of this Report, because it is, in some measure, out of date, and because we had in a few days to obtain the Report for the succeeding six months, when we will enter more fully on the subject. But before we dismiss the present notice, we may be permitted to tell, in one or two remarkable facts, and facilities of execution, with which the usual delinquent of a Report respecting crime, has, on this occasion, been relieved.

In page 34 of this Report, we find the Nizam Adulwalah has let slaves known and notorious Dacoits loose on the community. Sir John Hobbeson's solution for this Court is sufficiently known, and we must confess that we contemplate, with dread, the effect which may be produced on his mind by the perusal of so gross a charge.

The Report mentions, with apparent approbation, the opinion given by Mr. Macquiere to the Police Committee, that all Dacoits ought to be hanged, because they would commit murders, if necessary. To hang men not for what they have done, but for what they would do, if necessary, is certainly an improvement even on the law which made shoplifting, death without benefit of clergy.

Cattle thefts are, it seems, very common in the district of Rangoon, and have become a regular traffic to supply the Calcutta market. The Report remarks on this circumstance: "I trust the crime will gradually diminish; but as long as beef is extensively used and sold in the Calcutta market"—which will always be the case—"so long will this trade flourish." If the trade referred to, be the illicit trade, it is an insupportable prophecy; if the honest trade, the remark is singular in a Police Report.

It appears that Mr. J. H. Patton, while Magistrate of Beerbhoom, had ordered that all Dogees, or male persons, and all Tikoras, should sleep very near at the guard-house. The Tikoras are described as men who depend upon casual employment for their bread. They are, doubtless, a portion of that roving population "scattered in one of the speeches of the British India Society, ascribed to vagrancy by British oppression. In consequence of this law, no fewer than thirty-four thousand, six hundred and twenty-eight persons are left unprotected every night. On this, the Superintendent humorously remarks: "Malhous would have been delighted at this novel check on the increase of the population." We perceive, however, that His Honour, the Deputy Governor of Bengal, has ordered the practice to cease and determine; the Dogees, and Tikoras are restored to their families; and the necessity of adding a supplementary chapter to the next edition of Malhous, detaining Mr. Patton's new invented check on population, is happily obviated.

SATTAS AND SLAVERY.—It is with peculiar pleasure that we are enabled to close the labours of the year, by recording the acts of benevolence on the part of Government, which men of all parties may cordially unite in appreciating. In the recent arrangement, by which the throne of Sattara has been "inferred to an individual of more approved fidelity than the former Rajah, Sir James Carnac has bound the present occupant, by treaty, to abolish the rite of Sattas for ever throughout the State. This provision is rendered the more valuable; in as much as cases, have occurred, if we mistake not, since female immolation was abolished in our own territories, in which widows have been withdrawn from our reach, and taken into this independent state for the purpose of being sacrificed. Whether a similar engagement has been required of the Rajah of Jodhpore, in whom the British Government has recently imposed new conditions, we know not; but we think it would well become our Government, as the paramount power in India, to make every condition of a new treaty with any Native Prince, to guard from him the obligation of perpetrating this senseless practice from his dominions.

The other act to which we allude, is a treaty just concluded with four Maritime Arabian Chiefs, in which they covenant not to permit the slave trade to be carried on either in their territories, or under the protection of their flag; and concede the right of searching all vessels belonging to their ports. Within certain limits, to ascertain whether they contain slaves or not. By a steady perseverance in this benevolent line of conduct, it is to be hoped that as British influence is enlarged in the Arabian seas, now the high road between England and her Eastern possessions, the extensive slave trade which has been carried on for so many centuries, in the Red Sea, and through which the Arabians have inflicted the same miseries on the eastern shores of Africa, which European cupidity has inflicted on the Western, will be extinguished.

THE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.—The more a person can lose of his unfavourable impressions respecting his fellow-men, the happier it is for himself. We are therefore, thankful to our Correspondent, "A Member of the Education Committee," for his kindness in dimming our. Not that his letter has very materially changed our opinion respecting the Education Committee. We could before have very willingly subscribed to his assertion, that "there are individuals on that Committee, whose attachment to Christianity is no less sincere than that of the Editors of the Friend of India." Indeed, though the obscurity of its expression may justify a different interpretation, our meaning in the sentence, "Whether that antipathy be a personal feeling in the individual members of that Committee, or only an official principle, is not for us to determine," was to disclaim any judgement on the personal character of the members of the Committee, in reference to religion. It is only their official character, as exhibited in their corporate capacity, that we are at liberty to speak of. Of the private feelings, at least of individuals in the Committee, we had no more doubt than our Correspondent himself. Even he, however, goes no farther than some individuals; and by his apparent diffidence respecting the whole, he seems almost ready to join in the exclamation, Si vis omnes! The protest, however, conveyed in his letter, against the imputation of antipathy to religion, is not only becoming, and honourable to himself, but augurs well for the entire Committee; and we shall think the better of them for it.

Our Correspondent calls for facts in proof of our general allegations, respecting the antipathy of the Education Committee to religion, and says he does not comprehend what we allude to, and has no recollection of any orders of the Committee, by which their students have been warned against Christianity, or prohibited from listening to its advocates. We had certainly no conception, that it could be necessary to furnish any person moderately acquainted with the doings of the Committee, much less our Correspondent, with a distinct specification of such facts as he calls for. However, we may remind him of the time, when Dr. Duff began his able and effective lectures on the evidences of Christianity, and leaves it to his own speculation or research to determine, whether the Education Committee did not then pass rules for the restraint of the Students of the Hindoo College, in the matter of religious instruction. It is to be said, that a part of panic arose on that occasion against the Native, which might excuse if it did not justify, the intervention of the Committee; or, at any rate, that it is an old and forgotten thing, and the obvious rules have since a natural death, and it is therefore impossible to revive the reproach of them. That was our own fault, and that is why we happened to see the Kalm which have been written up within these few months by the Committee, of the Hindoo, or Mohammedan College. The Kalm then we shall to run thus: "Lectures and Teachers are prohibited from giving private instructions to scholars not belonging to the School, or from encouraging the attendance of pupils at private lectures." Were it not for past recollections, this might look harmless enough. But knowing, as all must do, the origin of the perhaps yet more stringent prohibitions enacted for the Hindoo College, we drew from it the conclusion, that the Committee were still determined to prescribe to their pupils respecting the occupation of their leisure hours, and to discourage, if not forbid, their attendance upon Christian lectures. It is true the rule only prescribes neutrality, on the part of the Lecturers and Teachers, in respect of private lectures. But when the formal rule goes so far, it is easy to understand how much farther the practical application may be carried. For instance, we have heard, that when the new Church was opened, of which Krishna Mohun Banerjee is the Minister, the students of the Hindoo College were expressly forbidden to attend, on pain of expulsion from the College. Most probably there is neither any standing rule of the College, nor was there any specific resolution of the Committee, to sanction such an order. It was nothing more, we imagine, than an example of the understood duty of Lecturers and Teachers in not "encouraging the attendance of pupils at private lectures," and our Correspondent may have been perfectly ignorant of its existence. Neither can we certainly vouch for the fact of such an order having been issued; we know it only by report: but if our Correspondent will inquire of Mr. Hare, who knows more of the College administration, we believe, than any other gentleman, he will learn the truth; and we shall be glad to know the result of his inquiries. Truly happy shall we be to find, that the impression we received respecting the Committee's antipathy to religion, from the report of such an interference, is not justified by fact.

In these same Rules for Muhammad Mohsin's College, we found another enactment still more objectionable. The 80th Rule gives this sweeping direction to the Lecturers: "They will be careful to avoid any reference whatever to religion in giving their Lectures." We can scarcely imagine any thing more insulting both to God and man than such a rule. Here are men engaged in the work of forming the minds of the choicest youth of a vast nation, and they lay it down as a first principle, that the very being of the God that made them is to be kept out of their thoughts, and the fact of the Gospel dispensation of divine mercy is, as it were, to be denied, by an absolute silence respecting it. Our youth are to be taught a Natural Philosophy without a First Cause—a Moral Philosophy, without a Supreme and Holy Will; and Human History mutilated of the greatest event the world has seen, and regardless of the mightiest influence by which our race has been affected. "They will be careful to avoid any reference whatever to religion." Is this to be taken literally as it stands? Or can our Correspondent inform us of any bye-law by which its observance is reconciled with common sense? We might say, with real fact: for certain we are, that general instruction has not, and never could have been given, either in the Hindoo College or elsewhere, without any reference whatever to religion. The rule looks more like an hypocritical attempt to discountenance religion, than an intelligible preventive of proselytism to Christianity. How could antipathy to religion be more distinctly expressed?

We beg not to be mistaken. We are decidedly as ever in maintaining, that Government Schools ought not to be appropriated to the inculcation of Christianity. But we object as strongly to their being made schools of Atheism, in which neither God nor Christ must be named—where the introduction of such names must be held to be a violation of propriety and good sense. The Education Committee cannot realize their conception of the absolute exclusion of religion. They had better honestly acknowledge its impracticability; and then consider in what sense religion is not to be incorporated with their system of instruction, and form a new set of rules accordingly. At present, they declare by their rules, that religion, natural and revealed, true and false, is absolutely excluded from their Seminaries. At the same time, every one knows that in the nature of things, it cannot be so. And the general impression is, that it is only respect for Christianity that is excluded, whilst to contempt for it there is no particular objection. Hence the Committee have a reputation for antipathy to religion, which, as our Correspondent shews, is unjust, at least, in respect of individual members, and distressing to their feelings. Let them leave loose, general expressions about the exclusion of religion, and adopt a definite line of conduct respecting it. Their course of instruction ought certainly to include as ample a system as possible of Natural Religion, without direct reference or application either to Christianity or Hindooism; and the facts of the gospel should be allowed, without reserve or apprehension, to occupy their natural place in the circle of human knowledge, as much as the rise of Mahomedanism, or any other event of the kind. These are small demands: but they are important; and we trust the Committee will soon redeem their character, by yielding compliance with them. They may say, in their rules respecting religion, what in fact they cannot mean; and they have little right to complain of a sense being attributed to their language, which is not according to their mind. When they speak in English, no one will have it in his power to misrepresent them.

THE LANDHOLDERS' SOCIETY, THE RESUMPTION, AND OUR CONTEMPORARIES.—Our remarks, in reply to the speeches made at the Landholders' meeting, have elicited some observations from the Harbors, which we briefly notice. He says: "Unfortunately, the Friend of India has defended the Resumption proceedings as they were—he has gone too far; he has proved himself in the matter a greater Papist than the Pope himself." The simile has not gained under the hand of our Contemporary. The original, "more royalist than the King," is, we think, better than the refinements of the Harbors. But to this point. The Harbors is totally and fundamentally wrong in this statement. He has entirely forgotten all we have written on the subject. He has time to refer to our pages, and he will forgive us for suggesting so dull a task at Christmas—he will find that the plan which Government has now adopted, is just that which we have all along recommended. We do not pretend to be the only thing which we have written, has weighed with the public authorities, as the writings of the Landholders' Society are reported to have done; but we notice it as an adventitious coincidence, which refutes the argument of our Contemporary, that the relaxation now given, corresponds with our own printed and disinterested advice. On the one hand, we have always advocated an unswerving resumption of all rotten tenures because we were unable to see the justice of allowing the real prices of the lands to be forever crippled, by the fraud and collusion of all classes. Although the Government of India may, at present, be a personification of all that is wicked in moral and political policy; yet the sentiment always has been ours. Under the despotic influence of the British India and the Landholders' Society, it is to be hoped that a great reform will be accomplished in the administration of this empire; and that at no distant period it will enjoy a mild and benign Government, of which the prevention of all Landlordism, in all time to come, will be reckoned among the least of its virtues: It is for that anxious season, that we are anxious to provide the sows of benevolence. We wish to secure for the future rulers of India, in that golden age which already dawns upon us, the fifty, sixty, or a hundred lakhs of Rupees of annual revenue, now usurped by the lakshidars which will be found so indispensable in working out the regeneration of India. On the other hand, we have always advocated the utmost possible leniency in assessment. We have earnestly entreated the Landholders' Society to step forward and promote a compromise between the claims of the State, and the convenience of individuals. We have, time after time, proposed that the assessment should be gradually laid out, so that its full weight should fall on the third or fourth generation, and press lightly and gently on the present holders. How, then, have we been "more royal than the King?"

The Harkara proceeds to say: "The Friend of India talks a good deal about the emancipation of the Press, but the fact is, that if the Press had not been on the eve of emancipating itself, it would not and could not have been emancipated by the Government." There was a time when the Harkara wrote in a different strain. When the Press was emancipated forty years ago, our Contemporary gave a loose to all the generous feelings of his soul in flowing accents, to which the coldness of his present sentiments forms a painful contrast. In September 1833, it was thus that he wrote:

"What a change has come over us! We could not contemplate the festive scene and hallowed purpose for which we were assembled without feelings of enthusiasm almost oppressive from their excess, at this evidence of the glorious triumph of light over darkness as it was happily designated by one of the guests—to think that we were assembled in that Town Hall, which until of late had never echoed a liberal political sentiment, where some twelve years since a banished Editor was not permitted to give a farewell breakfast to a few friends in one of the Committee rooms—to think that we were there assembled at a grand entertainment to celebrate the liberty of the press, in which civilians and military men of high talent and long standing in the service participated and fearlessly responded to the enthusiasm of those around them—to hear a relation of the Governor-General present assure us, that although our noble minded Ruler could not of course join in celebrating his own measure, he would otherwise have rejoiced to have been present, and that he went along with us in the liberal sentiments which had been expressed, and in that ardent devotion to the cause of liberty which seemed to animate every one present—to hear those things might well excite in our minds retrospections of the past, and joyous hopes of the future which those only can appreciate who have been enabled to mark the contrast—the vast change from darkness to light which the festival of Tuesday night was one of the signal evidences. Bold indeed would that man have been who twenty years ago had dared to prophesy that at the end of that time we should see the freedom of the press celebrated by a grand entertainment in the Town Hall, with the band of the Governor-General in attendance! To some this last circumstance may seem a matter of slight importance; but to us it appears far otherwise, for the circumstance of a Ruler's lending his hand for such an occasion, is in our minds by no means one of the least striking evidences of the progress of liberal opinions."

We are sorry to perceive that our Contemporary's gratitude for this great boon has so greatly diminished. But this is, perhaps, the natural order of things. The blessings which we have lately enjoyed, we cease to be thankful. It is human nature.

PROSECUTION ON MORROW'S INJUSTICE.—We published a letter last week from a valued Correspondent, who has adopted the name of Proctor, in which he alludes to several acts of injustice perpetrated under his own eye, for which our legislation affords no prompt remedy. It is easy to appreciate the benevolence which induced him to bring them forward to public notice, but to point out a plan by which such good feeling can be spared the pain of seeing them repeated, is by no means so easy as might, at first sight, be imagined. It is true, that to refer travelling merchants, who have been plundered by the villany of those with whom they have been dealing, to the remedy of a civil action, with all its usual procrastination of enquiry, and vexation of appeal, would be little short of a mockery of their distress; but even in our own happy land, the jurisprudence of which is represented as the perfect abstract of reason and justice, such cases would fail to command that instantaneous redress which we no less than our Correspondent, could wish them. And under the more ancient institutions of this country, we very much question, whether any redress could have been obtained at all. We are reluctantly driven to the necessity of referring such men to profit by their experience, to mistrust the representations of those who describe this land as a moral paradise, and its inhabitants as angels of innocence, and to act warily in all their dealings. As far as we have been enabled to trace the working of Government, we think we can discover an anxious desire to abridge the process and the delays of justice, and to expedite the decision of suits. It is to this point that the course of judicial reform has converged since Lord William Bentinck put down the old, heavy, lumbering coach of the Courts of Appeal, in which justice took its circuit twice in the circle of the year. But the means and appliances which are within reach of the public authorities are so limited, that hope has always been ahead of performance, and even the most ardent admirer of Government must confess, that it is not able to supply a tenth of the judicial wants of the people. We have incidentally learnt that Government has now under consideration an Act for establishing Courts in the country for the recovery of small debts, similar in their constitution to our Courts of Requests; but if we could suppose them already established, they would not have met the aggravated cases of wronging brought forward by our Correspondent. And to entrust the charge of this Civil Court to the Magistrate, would only be to lay on the "last straw which prostrates the load," and to renege, by a most undutiful marriage, the offices of Judge and Magistrate, which proved the source of such extensive misery in days that are past. We would rather divest the Magistrate of every encumbrance, that could prevent their devoting the whole of their time to the Police of the country. A Magistrate should not only have no occupation which he considers more pressing than his Magisterial duty, but no other avocation whatever. All the energy of his body, and every function of his mind should be devoted to the one object of catching thieves and murderers; and nothing but such a unity of purpose will free the country from them.

LORD NORMANBY'S ADMINISTRATION.—We published the letter of "A Reader" with some reluctance. Intended, as it is, to refute a remark we made, our Correspondent has some claim on our consideration; but nothing can be farther from our wish, than to be drawn into a general discussion of Irish politics, of all parties, the most irritating. We shall, therefore, limit this notice to the single remark which has drawn down his animadversions on us. Lord Normanby was summoned in the House of Lords, by his opponents, the Tories, for the wicked malignance of his administration in Ireland; and his former bosom friend, the great and consistent Lord Brougham, joined the hue and cry against him, and his Ministry of Government. This opposition to an administration, which had contributed, more than all others, to heal the wounds of centuries, appeared to us, as it did to many others, little short of a factions movement. The man who had pacified Ireland appeared to deserve better of the Hereditary Legislators of the land. We looked to the result of his administration, and we found an ample reply to every charge of delinquency. Under all former administrations, Ireland had been a millstone about the neck of England, the source of perpetual weakness and alarm. To secure the peace of that unhappy country, England was obliged to keep up a standing army of 24,000 men. Lord Normanby has, for the first time, so changed the circumstances of that country, that one-third of those troops could be spared, without endangering its tranquillity. We did not consider, that even in bringing about so conspicuous a change, the end was to be considered as sanctifying the means; but we considered that the means by which such an improvement had been achieved, could not in themselves be so very objectionable. And what were those means? A little excess of clemency; a larger exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy. The error in Government, if any has been committed, is, at least, on the safe side. And surely it was time to try the experiment of a different course from that which had hitherto been pursued. There can be no question, that Ireland has all along been ruled with a rod of iron; that the old principle, that it is better that ten guilty should escape, than that one innocent should suffer, has been reversed; and that we had adopted in her case the maxim, that it was better that ten innocents should suffer, than that one guilty should escape. And this excess of severity has constrained us to turn Ireland into a garrison. It was, therefore, wise, prudent and Christian, to try an opposite course. It has been tried, and has succeeded. Say that twenty, thirty, forty, or a hundred poor wretches, the victims equally of vice and starvation, have been liberated from jail: what is this evil when compared with the good which has been achieved, in the pacification of the country? But it was not the simple act of emancipating these jail birds that has produced this magical effect on the warm sensibilities of the Emerald Isle. It was the general tone of conciliation, of which the compassion towards the prisoners as but an index, which touched the heart of Ireland, and made the presence of troops comparatively redundant.

As to the other part of our Correspondent's letter, we shall not be suspected of lax Protestantism when we say, that while any undue partiality to Catholics is not to be defended, their admission to those offices of State, in the land of their birth, to which by their standing in society, their education, and their moral feelings, they were fully entitled, does not appear to us so very atrocious. Our Correspondent forgets that we are committed to the opinion, that Hindoos, whom he may possibly consider as less entitled to consideration than Catholics, ought to be extensively employed in the public administration of affairs in this country; and that the efforts of Government ought to be mainly directed to qualify them for these high posts. We cannot be guilty of the inconsistency of denying to Catholics rights, or privileges, if a Reader will, which we would concede to Pagans. We are as anxious as our Correspondent can be, that all Roman Catholics should embrace what we consider to be the Truths of Protestantism; and that this conversion may be accelerated, we would begin by giving them a specimen of Protestantism, not Orangeism, equity, justice and moderation. England has now laboured at the conversion of Ireland for three centuries by coercion, by the cart whip and the triangle, the gall and the gibbet, and the Catholics have increased from one million to seven. We are to try the milder arts of persuasion; and we consider that those who have endeavoured to work out home tily and fully fully the principles of that measure, namely, Catholic Emancipation, which the country owes to Twelve feelings, either of justice or apprehension, as the best friends not only of Ireland, but also of the Protestant cause; for it is impossible that Catholicism can grow more to a head under the efforts of mildness, than it has done under the coercive measures of Lord Normanby's predecessors. But whether the generous principles of the present administration of Ireland issues in the preponderance of Catholicism or Protestantism, it is certain that we owe something to Ireland, to efface the memory of our persecuting laws. If the reader would know what those laws were, let him peruse the annexed synopsis of the merciful code, by which Ireland was governed during the last century, extracted from the Edinburgh Review:

"The sufferings of the Catholics have been an sadly etched in the very streets, that it is almost needless to remind our readers, that during the reigns of George I. and George II. the Irish Roman Catholics were disabled from holding any civil or military office, from voting at elections, from admission into corporations, from practising law or physic. A younger brother, by turning Protestant, might deprive his elder brother of his birth-right: by the same process, he might force his father, under the name of a liberal provision, to yield up to him a part of his landed property; and if an eldest son, he might, in the same way, reduce his father's fee-simple to a life estate. A Papist was disabled from purchasing freehold lands—and even from holding long leases—and any person might take his Catholic neighbour's house by paying for it. If the child of a Catholic turned Protestant, he was taken away from his father and put into the hands of a Protestant relative. No Papist could purchase a freehold, or lease, for more than thirty years—or inherit from an intestate Protestant—or from an intestate Catholic—nor dwell in Limerick or Galway—nor hold an advowson, nor buy an annuity for life, nor was given for discovering a popish Archbishop—Cof. for a popish Clergyman—and 10s. for a Schoolmaster. No one was allowed to be trustee for Catholics; no Catholic was allowed to take more than two apprentices; no Papist to be executor, sheriff, or to serve on grand juries. Houses of Papists might be seized for the militia; for which militia Papists were to pay double, and to find Protestant substitutes. Papists were prohibited from being present at vestries, or from being high or petty constables; and, when resident in towns, they were compelled to find Protestant watchmen. Barristers and solicitors marrying Catholics, were exposed to the penalties of Catholics. Persons plundered by privateers sitting a war with any Popish prince, were reimbursed by a levy on the Catholic inhabitants where they lived. All Popish priests celebrating marriages contrary to 12 Geo. I. cap. 3., were to be hanged."

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 19.

—The Raval of Jessolnere has announced his intention of going on pilgrimage to Brindaban and Scoring Chank, and the Governor General has issued the usual orders for his being saluted on his arrival at, and departure from, military cantonments.

—Yesterday evening's Gazette contains the Draft of two new Acts, the object of which is to extend the English law of Dower, and to amend the law of Inheritance. It also promulgates a new Act to provide, that the Decrees duly authenticated of the Judicial authorities of the 24-Pergunnahs shall be executed by the Magistrates in Calcutta. Perhaps this will remove one of the causes which led Mr. Smith, the Superintendant of Police, to record these remarkable words in his Report:—"It appears to me that the samplings of undisciplined superiority in power, knowledge, and ability assumed by the Sudder Court in such an offensive and insolent manner, against the Calcutta Magistrate in their conduct towards the Mofussil Magistrate, obliged by their conduct, I should say, that the Calcutta Police Office is an anti-act, instead of a co-operative power in this state of things ought not to exist, and cannot be tolerated."

—General Oglethorpe, broken down in constitution by repeated attacks of fever, will go, it is said, immediately to Europe. His loss will be long and deeply felt. He is one of the men on whom those who are in distress, and ready to drop, might always calculate for assistance. He has acquired, like a Prince, all our public institutions, but on the true evangelical principle of not allowing the left hand to know what the right hand does. Sir E. Williams is spoken of as his successor.

—Sir John Keane's column reached the Attock, in all ages the ford of India, on the 26th, and it was to cross on a bridge of boats. Strange, passing strange, that the first time a British detachment crossed the Indus at the Attock, it should return from the West, in the track of Alexander the Great.

—The Khyberies have been conciliated, it is said, by an offer of 30,000 Rupees a year from the English, and will not rob or plunder while it is paid. Dost Mahomed paid them irregularly—12,000 a year. If we had not inflicted so sound a punishment on them, before we began to treat, this compromise in Bob Boy's country, would have looked somewhat like paying black mail.

—The Algerine is sent on from Bombay to Suez with despatches, but it is important, though whether about the Russian advance to Khiva, or Commissioner Lin's detention of the Windsor, or the Landholders' Society, we have not yet learnt. It is reported she will reach Suez a fortnight before the next Steam Packet.

—In Assam every thing is said to be profoundly quiet.

—The Governor-General was at Muttra on the 8th Instant, and was to reach Agra on the 17th.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20.

—Mr. G. Udny has sent in his resignation of office of Secretary to the Bengal Bank. We learn that the Directors are unanimously in their choice of Mr. Bracken, as his successor, but they are anxious to know whether, if the choice should fall on an Unconcocted, Government will contribute to a small share of the salary.

—A meeting of the Indigo Planters was held yesterday, to form a Society for the purpose of protecting their interests, as a separate and distinct body. Mr. Bagshaw is said to set forth the advantages of such a union in a luminous and appropriate address. According to good old Saxon custom, the meeting dined together in the evening.

—Letters from the Punjab state, that affairs are going on from bad to worse. The Court has returned to Lahore, and His Majesty will now have an opportunity of stating his grievances to Sir John Keane, or some of the influential men who are returning from the conquest of Afghanistan. The return of part of the force through the Punjab lays at rest the rumour so generally repeated, that the Sikhs had refused a passage to the troops.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21.

—The 8th Foot is in orders to march from Hamroebang to Agra. The Cymerosians are also to move, but their destination is not yet known.

—A handsome marble slab has been erected in Cabul over the remains of the late lamented Col. Herring, who was so brutally murdered at Hyder Khali. The inscription is in English and Persian.

—Cossinath Dutt was tried in the Supreme Court, on the 19th, for having embezzled 4,290 Rs. from the Bank of Bengal, and was acquitted.

—A public meeting has been held at Madras, for the purpose of forming a Permanent Committee, with the view of collecting information and correspondence, and co-operating with Government, in the measures about to be adopted for cleansing the drains in Black Town.

—Rajah Kurruck Singh has offered a reward of 200 Rs. for any person who will apprehend the villains who attacked Col. Wymer.

—The Landholders' Association has published a paper, with their remarks on the proposed alterations in the sale law.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22.

—The Right Hon. Mr. Parnell took his departure for Benares, on the 7th Instant. The request he made for permission to visit the tomb of his deceased ancestor, at Benares.

—The Right Rev. Father Joseph Anthony Knight, Bishop of Bethsaida, as a Vicar Apostolic of Agra, has arrived at Agra from Bombay, to which place he came on the 2nd Instant from Benares.

—At the close of War, in the suburbs of Benares, in the midst of orders from home by the next Mail to proceed to China. The Ordnance Department at Benares, for some time past, exhibited a scene of unusual activity.

—The Indian Review of the present month, has a very striking sketch of that liberal and unselfish Father in Christ, Rastomjee Cowasjee, Esq. It is accompanied by a brief memoir, and also a notice of the early history of the Parsons of Benares.

—The Lord Bishop arrived at Benares on the 12th Instant, and preached twice.

—A considerable body of Ministers, Missionaries, and laymen, have published a protest against the Ordinance, consisting of Handel's Messiah, to be given this evening in the Town Hall. The papers are filled with discussions on the subject, although they would not admit the protest itself in their columns, even as an advertisement.

—The Madagascar Steamer is this morning announced from the Isle of France.

—Kunwar Krishnath Roy, the second largest Zemindar in Bengal, has given a silver Candelabra, valued at 2,000 Rupees, to be run for at the ensuing races.

—The valuable Indigo Factories belonging to the estate of Messrs. Ferguson and Co., and Messrs. Colvin and Co., were put up to auction on Saturday last, but obtained no bidders beyond the upset price.

—The State Prisoners at Ghaznee have contrived to make their escape.

—The Vernon, which has now been at sea ninety-three days, and some anxiety appears to be felt regarding her safety. The determination of going into the Cape was a fatal error of Capt. Dwyer. He has thereby lost the credit of having made the shortest voyage on record to India.

—Capt. Sir James Brunner, Knight, G. C. H. of the Algerine 26 guns, succeeds ad interim to the command of H. M. Squadron, serving in the East India.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 24.

—Mr. M. Johnston, Collector of Culeutta, charged with Perjury, in the case of Mr. Jacobs, an Insolvent, was yesterday tried in the Supreme Court, and acquitted.

—The Madagascar, it appears, is come up to Calcutta, for sale, and is valued by the owners at 18,000 Poude sterling.

—A letter from the neighbourhood of Hamroebang states, that two wild elephants, of enormous size, had made their appearance, and done great injury to the country. The largest measured twenty-six feet, nine inches and a half, from the tip of the trunk to the tip of the tail. Capt. Russell, commanding the Ramgur Battalions, proceeded against them with a large posse, and dug two large holes into which they were enticed, but not being sufficiently deep, one got out and assisted the other to escape with its trunk. It was then found necessary to bring the four pounders up, and to discharge grape at them. They repeatedly and boldly charged the guns, but the artillery men stood bravely to them, and they fell at length covered with wounds and glory. Nine four pound shots have been taken out of their bodies. They are supposed to have escaped from Hyderabad, as elephants of such unusual size are not found in the north.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 25.

—The Governor General reached Ferozepore on the 14th Instant. His Lordship, in all probability, will make a short stay at Agra, and come on to Allahabad without delay, and there embark for Calcutta.

—Mr. H. Borradale, of the Bombay Civil Service, who has just come to Calcutta from the Cape, having been appointed a member of the Law Commission, will immediately take his seat at the Board.

—Sir John Keane, with the returning army, was expected to reach Ferozepore by the 7th of January. The Sikhs are said to treat our officers with great insolence.

—Dr. Nicholas J. Chantagoff who was residing at Gwalpore, under the surveillance of the Police, under the idea that he was a spy of Nicholas, Emperor of Russia, has just died at that station. The suspicion regarding him was confirmed by the fact of his having recently visited Russia. He had latterly employed himself in dispensing medicine in the city.

dia; never had any local experience of its physical and moral peculiarities, and, therefore, conceived himself much more admirably fitted for his task, than he had—when our countrymen draw theories from England, it would be good if they understood England. It is not because in England we have a landed aristocracy, that our agriculture has improved, but because the laws of England afford to the cultivator protection against his Lord." It is here, Sir, that the shopkeepers. The perpetual settlement arranged matters very much to the satisfaction of the Zemindars, who had pretty much the same right to the estates presented to them, that you or I, or the Editor of the Observer has—but as respected the Ryots they were left pretty much in the position of the frogs who had a king given them. The Government since that time have done all that lay in their power to secure the Ryot from the rapacity of the Zemindar—the rest depends on the latter. "The fallen estates of these families, show ancestors were magnates in the land, is proverbial." And is not this, pretty much the case all over the world? Here various seasons have conducted in every instance to this result. It has in India been frequently the effect of ruinous extravagance or family arrangements. "To his thinking, (the Observer) the Scram-pore Peshdarnad presents about one of the latest attempts to cover a bad cause that he ever witnessed." Now, which is the lame cause? One that requires the most careful exaggeration to support it, or that which rests entirely on facts, and makes no appeal to the passions? Which is the best cause? That which defends the rights of Proprietors to hold estates obtained by the village community, and would find the best support in possession, through such references, at the expense of the Government, and without any consideration for the enjoyment of such landed property to the State from which it was unjustly tricked?—or that which claims that the Government is entitled to something for the use of its land, and to prevent the like alienation in future? Which is the true Friend of India—he who advocates the cause of the poor, or the cause of an oligarchy of Landholders? However paradoxical it may appear, the cause of the masses, that is, of the peasantry, and the manufacturers—and that of Government in this sense—that is to say, the Government is most anxious to protect these classes from the rapacity and oppression of the landed aristocracy.

So far does my opinion of your strictures differ from the Observer's, that I deem them a triumphant reply to the objections. "But what are the Baboo (exclusive the Observer) to the great masses of the people throughout India?" Just your argument, Sir, and what surprises me is, that the Observer should not have perceived that you were all along advocating the cause of these masses, and that you deprecated the exaggerated odium cast on a Government that has exhibited the utmost solicitude to benefit the condition of the people at large. Let a just charge of oppression against the Government be proved, and I know that there would be a more prompt and fearless exposure of the wrong than The Friend of India. This I say in all sincerity; for I am an ardent admirer of the Government, or The Friend of India.

But your reference to Rohilkand is rather an unfortunate one. Consider how impoverished that country was before it was given to us; and to that wasted exhausted condition, reduced, not by the British Government, but by its masters, the Native Princes, who succeeded in grinding themselves, as well as the country, down. It may not present the most prosperous aspect in the world, even now: it is not an Acrebia; but it does, nevertheless, exhibit a very different state of things to what it did before the occupation of the country by the British.

This, Sir, is a letter written on the spur of the moment, and either calls on attention. I content myself, therefore, with a few remarks, by way of conclusion, and leave the inference to your readers. With all his mistakes, the Editor of the Observer is, I believe, a just and a good man. He should, therefore, not be rash in attributing motives to others. He certainly has done himself justice in saying that you "floundered about for gallies of the Government measure." This is certainly a very strong word, but it is not correct for the floundering in all his words and sentences. Let him answer the question in future faithfully, as an argumentative fact which I have thus very cursorily noticed; but for now, let it be two.

The resumptions in the last year, 1845, (H.C.) were seven lakhs; the cases decided against the Government, seventy-three lakhs; the appeals against the Resumptions were not one per cent.

The Rance of Burdwan has the largest and best portion of the hereditary landed property in her possession for her life—the Jaimia is 32 lakhs; and the whole profits of the ancestral estate, at least 16 lakhs.

The sale of the properties of the Rajas of Dinagapore, Nuddea, &c., arose from their own improvidence. Their estates were purchased by their own servants. For particular instances of this, it is not, perhaps, necessary at present to trouble you.

The Rajah of Burdwan's estates were sold and purchased by his mother; and in fact, until the enactment of Regulation VIII. of 1819, which was made on purpose to keep his property in his hands, the Rajah's estate was never safe; not because he was improvident, or his estate was ever assessed, but because the under Talookdars and Farmers never would pay their rents without compulsion.

GAMMA.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIR,—In your last Number, viz., that of the 13th Instant, there is an Editorial statement, headed in Capital, "Antipathy of the Education Committee to Religion." Surely this is a very injurious imputation upon some of the members of that Committee? Any some of the members; since you are, I presume, aware, that there are Native gentlemen on the Committee. Perhaps you may have heard an echo of a Colonel in the Royal Service, who, having no notion of any class of soldiers giving in to any nonsense regarding Dietetics, issued an order, that a Sepoy Regiment of his Brigade should carry good wholesome rations of Beef on the line of march, through a country where provan was not expected to be very abundant, and the means of carriage were scarce. You may imagine the sensation produced by the promulgation of this hookum! The rations, however, were given out for distribution; but it is one thing to offer a man a piece of beef, and another for him to accept it. You may lead a horse to the water, &c. I do not think, Sir! Nubeen maugha! I was the universal exclamation of the Sepoys. His Excellency hearing of the row, reprimanded the officer for his lack of what is considered the best part of valour by some philosophers, and strictly forbade his saying accipis hoc, after that fashion, to Sepoys again. Now, my dear Sir, would you infer from this, that His Excellency hated Beef? or would such be a legitimate inference from the premises?

The Committee of Public Instruction have a serious duty entrusted to them by the Government, which is, to confer the blessings of Education on as many of the Native youth of India, as can be comprehended within the potentiality of a certain annual sum of the public money. Thus deriving their powers directly from the State, the Committee, should the object entrusted to them, represent the Government; and yet many well-meaning persons would have this body to adopt a course which every man in his senses, who knows the country, and its anomalies well, (none more so than yourself,) would pronounce a very inexpedient and dangerous course for the Government to adopt. Our duty, Sir, is to teach the Natives useful elementary knowledge. To proselytise them is left to a class, peculiarly fitted for, and called to, the sacred task. Through their Administration, by Divine Grace, many may, and undoubtedly will be brought to the fold of the Supreme Shepherd.

For the Education Committee to attempt indoctrination of the Natives, would be utterly inconsistent with their duty. They could neither in honour nor honesty advance a step in such a course. If they did, they would be improperly compromising the Government, and betraying the trust reposed in their good faith by Native parents and guardians. All this I state, not with reference to any remarks of yours, but to observations that have come to my knowledge from other quarters; and you, with your usual good sense, (which is but another word for a just perception of things), have frankly stated the principle, "that in Government Schools instruction in the Christian religion would be out of place." You know very well, Sir, that the Natives of India are strongly attached to their own systems. It is true that whole masses of them are very ignorant and superstitious, and equally so, that superstition and ignorance are the fruitful source of much moral evil and dire cruelty. It would be to dilate a truism to dwell on the fact, that Education not only has a tendency to mitigate these, but even to confer great temporal blessings on the recipients. It is not the province of the Education Committee to go beyond this; and I can scarcely imagine that those who impute the proceedings of our Committee, because they do not indolentize Christianity in our schools, are prepared to assert that a Native is a worse subject or man, because he is taught English Grammar, Reading and Writing, Geography and Elementary Mathematics, &c. I should suppose that by such a training, the mind of the alumnus is weeded of much that rendered him a less amiable and valuable member of society. After being educated, he is surely, in a civil and political sense, a more efficient and useful being? Or, at any rate, more capable of being made so. Is he not by such preparation rendered more tangible to religious impressions, properly conveyed? If so, it is for those whose peculiar vocation it is, to administer such to him. We cannot do it; and it is absolutely necessary that the Natives should be thoroughly convinced of there being no collusion between the Committee, and other parties, to tamper with their religion. Were such a suspicion once to obtain the slightest credence, I believe that we might at once shut up all our schools.

So far, Sir, with respect to certain opinions I have heard stated—now to one or two positions of your edit. You state that the Committee have “voluntarily, on many occasions,” their interference to prevent the young men under their instruction giving any attention to the Gospel.” Further on you state, “that the Committee have thought it their duty to prescribe to the pupils of their Seminaries where they shall go, or not go, during the hours which should be at their own disposal.” What ever be the motive, they have come to teach their students against Christianity, and even to prohibit their hearing at its advocates, as an offence against College discipline.” Now, I have simply to ask where, and when have the Committee done this? I do not really comprehend what you allude to, and have no recollection of any such orders. The favour, then, that I am now to solicit is, that you would have the goodness distinctly to state the instances in which the Committee have interfered in the manner stated. Allow me to add, that your closing observation is not such as I should have anticipated from your calm and good feeling. You are pleased to say—“All this betoken, we think, an antipathy to religion, which is unseemly and injurious. Whether that antipathy be a personal feeling in the individual members of that Committee, or only an official principle, is not for us to determine. We shall be glad to adopt the more charitable conclusion.” Here you first assume that there is an antipathy on the part of Christian Members of the Committee to the Christian Religion, and you hint that it is a personal feeling! This may be charitable, Sir, but it is scarcely generous. There are individuals on that Committee, whose attachment to Christianity is, I believe, no less sincere than that of the Editors of the Friend of India.

I have the honour to be, dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,
A MEMBER OF THE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.
Calcutta, Dec. 17, 1838.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.
Sir, I received with considerable surprise and pain, that I have seen in your paper, which is generally conducted upon sound and religious principles, a statement, that the fact of the Queen's Ministers being able to withdraw troops from Ireland, is a decisive answer to the mass of evidence taken by the Lords' Committee, regarding the Irish administration of Lord Normanby; but I feel confident that you will not support the proposition, either in morals or politics, that the end justifies the means; and that it matters not how wrong, or how inconsistent with moral principle, the means resorted to may be, so that the end be produced, is good.

The Italics in the cited passages are mine. A. M. of the E. C.

Yet this is the direct tendency of the inference you have drawn, though, doubtless, without any intention of advocating such a principle. The Lords have not condemned every part of Lord Normanby's administration, but they have asserted the fact, that His Lordship exercised the prerogative of the Crown, in the pardon of criminals, capriciously and injudiciously; and they have, therefore, interposed, in order to prevent Lord Normanby's conduct from being converted into a precedent. That His Lordship's conduct was irregular and injudicious in this instance, seems to be generally allowed, for the Ministerial papers, and Lord Melbourne himself, do not justify those particular proceedings, but ground their defence of Lord Normanby on the principle, that his administration should not be judged by isolated facts, but from its general scope and tendency. As a Protestant Christian, I cannot allow the justice of these arguments. An act which is wrong in itself, can never be made right by its after consequences; and although a capricious abuse of the powers entrusted to His Lordship may have constituted the affections of a people, such as the Irish, towards him, it does not at all follow that such conduct was right, or that the release of convicted criminals was justifiable.

If criminals are to be released, merely that a Lord Lieutenant may gain popularity in his tour through the country, then all law is a farce, and those prisoners who are still confined, while others are set at liberty, are the victims of oppression, and not of their own crimes.

In the case of Lord Normanby it is clearly made out, that he liberates prisoners, not because he had any previous knowledge of their case, but because he happened to pass through the neighbourhood where they were confined. You have heretofore brought to the notice of the public, in your paper, the rapid progress which Roman Catholicism is making in the United Kingdom; and as sincere Protestants, I conclude that you regret it, and yet it is a well known fact, that the power and influence of Her Majesty's Government, (more especially in Ireland,) have been employed in the support of that Church, and that all has been done, which lay within the power of Ministers, for the extension and encouragement of that faith.

I have seen it stated in your paper, that the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, (Lord Fortescue,) is acting with strict impartiality to all parties; and if such be the case, I rejoice to hear it; but at all events, it is directly contrary to the system of policy pursued by Lord Normanby and his Colleagues; for while Lord Brougham, Sir R. Peel, and other statesmen, have occasionally exercised their patronage for the benefit of worthy men of all parties, Her Majesty's present Ministers have adopted a systematic course of partiality, and have promoted none, but their own followers, and in Ireland, more especially Catholics. Nor have they been contented with the simple abuse of patronage. They have so oppressed and ill-treated the Protestants of Ireland, that many high-principled Magistrates, and other functionaries, have been compelled to resign their situations, in order to avoid insult and persecution.

Although numberless instances could be cited of the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers to the Protestants of Ireland, I will content myself with one; and then ask whether any man of right feeling or principle can justify such proceedings.

The Rev. Mr. Delaney, an Evangelical preacher of great power, was on a visit to Archdeacon Magree, in the south of Ireland, when he gave it out publicly, that it was his intention to preach a Sermon on the errors of Popery, in the Archdeacon's Church, on the next Sunday. The Catholics declared, that they would not permit it; and Capt. Duff, the Police Magistrate of the District, having endeavored in vain to dissuade Mr. Delaney from doing what he conceived to be his duty, viz., preaching the Gospel in a Protestant Church, actually placed him under arrest, in his friend's house, and detained him several days, all the time while he had proposed to preach, had freely elapsed. Dr. Magree immediately reported the circumstances to Lord Normanby, who, instead of once punishing this outrageous violation of all law and justice, actually referred the case to the law officers of the Crown, in order that he might be informed whether it could be supported or not; and it was only when he found that up to the present time, the Hindus might surely wait for education during the next generations to come. They are in the twilight of false religions, confused among dreams and fancies, and doubtless they are fast becoming a few of the nations to look up from their prostration under ignorance and idolatry. In the natural state of life they are in rude simplicity. They know nothing of political constitutions or government, but as the will of the native power of power, exerted in direct arbitrary command, or through the medium of a most barbarous machinery of laws. Their literature—the trivial trash of it that finds its way among the people—mixes them with false and most ridiculous and degrading the most mischievous. In this condition they have been stagnant through more than two thousand years. And yet are suddenly required to allow their fitness to receive a national education, and their title to receive it; and there are institutions appointed by the government, and additional ones proposed to be so appointed, for that purpose.

But we say, let them keep busy behind their betters. For here, at home, is a nation whose authority is paramount over all these multitudinous of India; powerful, and boastful of its power. In every direction; famous in arts and arms, as verse and prose have proclaimed ten thousand times; high in speculation and energetic in action; favoured through ages with the true religion; possessing the powers of nature to human advantage; abounding in institutions designed for the public good; and yet of such a nation a vast proportion are doubtless barbarous and ignorant, since it is the will of the predominant orders that the public resources shall not be applied to the education of the people; for by insisting on impracticable conditions they pronounce in effect an absolute veto. This will of the superior is lauded and seconded by great numbers of those below, including a regimental host of possessed by hyper-sensitive religiousness, many of them accused by history and veracity, and an even greater number seduced by stratagem and imposition. So that, as far as at present foreseen, the land is to be kept through many centuries yet to come, the hideous deformity of an uneducated and most degraded populace.

The one being so, we should think that, according to our supposed love of proportional advancement, the people of India might yet for a good while stay about where they are. In mental cultivation, even the best classes of them are not much behind hundreds of thousands in this country; probably not behind at all.

But if they must be educated, why, be it so. To be sure, this will be conferring the benefit of education on Pagans; and without imposing any condition as to their religious opinions. Pagans say they are, and as a great majority of them will probably really be, they are not so far from the truth. But under the auspices, and at the expense, of a Christian state. Are they to enjoy the benefits thus exempt from conditions, in consideration that Paganism is not a sectarian mode of religion, but the real established church of their country; and that therefore its adherents are respectively standing on privileged ground? Certainly, diverse of say statements have testified no small respect for that established system, and have been no more pleased that they should be separated from it, than that there should be dissensions from our own Establishment here. We will, however, venture to hope, that their accession from the established faith and worship, when in any instance it does happen, may not take to their disadvantage, either as to their facilities for acquiring useful acquaintance, or as to their promotion to stations and employments for which those acquirements will qualify them. Therefore, any becoming a nonconformist to Paganism was far from being appropriate to a man's success.

It is but lately that any serious thought of such a thing as education for the people of India appears to have entered the mind of the Christian Government that has so long held a despotic power over them. They were reckoned by the tens of millions as the living material of 'our Indian Empire'; the boast of our mighty achievements of victory and policy; and the illustration of the superiority of Europe to Asia, and of England over the rest of Europe. In any moral estimate they were held insignificant enough; they might shiver (though defectively, it is true, the purpose which we remember to have seen some French philosopher (see philosophes) representing at the end and aim of human existence, namely, to develop the physical capacities of the globe, to turn it into a more fertile, a more productive, by creating and regenerating faculties of fertility and beauty. They were also the subjects of elaborate speculation in all reference to revenue, economy, political adjustment, and the British Government of India and its various-making among them. Due care being of all this, it was of no importance that more than a tenth part of the whole human race, under the sovereign control of a civilized and Christian state, should remain, as to whatever would impart rational life to its minds, just where Pagan and Hindu barbarism seemed to have left them; just where a most ineffectual, corrupt, and perverted system of education were resolved to keep them so, where thousands of years had witnessed their prostration, and where even to come, would pass over and leave them, under the heavy, dark, foreign yoke, should be exerted to

Here, at home, there would be no man to be so inferior as of whose thoughts and wishes went beyond the views of the British Government, and politicians, the observation that the British Government, the power and territory in which that state, which is the special dispensation of Providence, especially designed for the deliverance of the people from the misery of their intellectual and moral abasement. Within the past age religious zeal has been directed thither in missionary enterprises, which have been especially promoted by good men in every mode that was possible with small pecuniary means, a very limited number of missionaries, and the active favour of the governing power, under all which difficulties and discouragements they have been indefatigable in their efforts to diffuse knowledge, by translations of the sacred Scriptures, by personal addresses, by small printed treatises, and by schools for the children. But such notions of providential design, and such an impulse to attempt some humane manifestation towards its accomplishment, were regarded by those in the exercise of power as a wild fanaticism; by some of them as tending to a mischievous and dangerous distribution. We need not be very old to remember what jealous repugnance there was in the East, and what furious declamation here in England; what malignant calumny; what ribaldry of verse; what ranting denunciations of speedy ruin if such an larva on the peace of India should not be promptly quenched. By persons affecting to extend the European program in knowledge, and countenance of a faithful adherence to the governing power, the religious of our country, we were taught that the people of India needed none of our lights; that they were good and happy as they were, in the mental education, the religious faith, the commercial economy, inherited from their ancestors; and, moreover, that on all this there was the stamp of perpetuity, so that no foreign interference could effect a change; and the vain attempts to do so would result in a dreadful catastrophe.

In our observations we may perhaps seem to be attempting too broadly that the hostility to an attempted innovation on the religion was to name it, of the people, included or implied an aversion to their being brought under a new mental cultivation of a more general kind. It was a very special hostility, indeed, that was felt to any design of substituting the property for their Paganism; but there was also, in the very nature of the case, the ill-fated man should ever be regarded as rational intelligence by sound instruction of a more general kind.

That in late years a beneficent change of sentiment and policy has arisen and become hopefully progressive, is shown in this interesting and excellently-written work. We wish some could be so much as expiation of the count as would speculate how much might be assignable to the exertions of those men whose leading object has been the introduction of Christianity; but the operations for that main purpose have been diversified into all the expedients within the competence of persons without authority, for promoting education and moral reform. There is reason to believe, that an influence from this source has gone powerfully into the alternative process which has been liberating the recalcitrant European, and undoing the prejudices of the natives. Those Christian philanthropists, who perhaps never have full justice done them by historians of British India; but we are not sure that they sought; and their reward will be of superior merit and elsewhere."—Eclectic Review.

NEW YORK.—The onward march of the Empire State may be seen in the ample provision made by the Legislature, and the growing interest felt among the people, for the education policy of the state. In the August number of Columbia's Review is an interesting article on the subject from the pen of Loring M. Chapin, Esq., a member of the Assembly. The following is an abstract of it.

There are in this state 10,000 district schools, with 440,000 scholars, and a state capital of more than 2,000,000 dollars, amount of state income from the above capital is $24,000,000 dollars, and the appropriation $20,000,000 dollars. The excess from this amount is derived are comprehensively exhibited in the table referred to.

The whole capital still in a few years amount to $20,000,000 dollars without any further provisions than those now appropriated for its increase. Total expenses of our public schools amounted to 1,000,000 dollars, and the total amount of capital used another $1,000,000 in our colleges, universities, and in our libraries, is 1,300,000 dollars.

It appears, also, that there are 100 incorporated academies in our state, 100 of which report 17,500 students, 7,125 of which are pursuing higher classical studies. The capital invested in 100 of these academies amounted to 1,000,000 dollars, and their annual revenue to 100,000 dollars. Of the literature fund appropriated to the state for the academy, which funds should have been 5,000,000 dollars, which is distributed in proportion to the number of students in the district, with the average attendance of 100,000 students in 100 academies. Each academy receiving 10,000 dollars of state aid, the total of this fund, is required by law to be used by the academy for the improvement of students in the academy, and there are no such such department above the academy in this state.
